It is argued by counsel for the appellant that the order of 1915 is not valid—first, because it applies to all institutions, and, he says, the Board is bound to exercise its discretion in respect of each separate one, and must consider each institution separately. Authorities have been cited to us in which it has been decided that when a person applies for a licence he is entitled to have his case considered individually, and that if magistrates or other authorities lay down some general rule as to conditions which must be fulfilled that is a bad exercise of discretion. In my judgment, these authorities have no application to a case of this sort. If the Board of Control can make an order, as they are given power to do, in respect of any institution, it seems to me to follow that they can make an order in respect of every institution. If they can make an order in respect of every institution it would be surely a matter of supererogation to say that they have to issue an order in respect of each institution, naming it. What they have done, and what they, in my opinion, were entitled to do, was to say: "We are going to apply this proviso which Parliament has allowed us to apply to all these institutions." I think the Board of Control have power to make an order which applies to all institutions. They have power to make it in one document, and it was not necessary for them to make it in several documents.

The other point which counsel for the appellant raises is that the proviso only applies to persons who were detained in institutions at the date when the Act came into force. That would be, as I said, on Apr. 1, 1914. In my opinion, that is not the true construction of this proviso. It would, indeed, be somewhat odd if that were the true construction, because obviously the effect of the proviso would very soon wear off. If it only applied to the people who were detained on a particular day of the year 1914, in 10 or 15 years it would apply to very few, and shortly it would apply to nobody. It is in the case of institutions that the order is to be made and not in the case of an individual, and, if the Board say: "All institutions are to be affected by this order," all institutions are affected by the order and the persons in those institutions are subject to the order being continued until the particular quarter day which follows the date on which it would otherwise expire.

In my opinion, there is nothing in either of these two points. I think the matter is clear and that SLADE, J., was right in refusing this writ. The appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

HUMPHREYS, J. : I agree.

BYRNE, J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Cassavetti, Coustas & Co. (for the appellant); Solicitor, Ministry of Health (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BARBER v. BARBER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Willmer, J.), October 18, 1948.]

Adultery—Evidence—Cross-examination—“Have you ever committed adultery?”—General charge of adultery pleaded—Particulars of specific acts—Denial in evidence of specific acts—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 198.

By s. 198 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 :
 “The parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and the husbands and wives of the parties shall be competent to give evidence in the proceedings, but no witness in any such proceedings, whether a party thereto or not, shall be liable to be asked or be bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery unless he or she has already given evidence in the same proceedings in disproof of the alleged adultery.”

A husband in his petition for divorce on the ground of adultery stated that on divers dates and in places unknown the wife had committed adultery with a man or men unknown to the husband. In his particulars of the adultery alleged he stated that the wife had constantly spent her evenings away from home in the company of other men, had boasted of her adultery with various men, and had attributed her pregnancy to adultery, and he also gave particulars of some of the specific allegations of adultery. At the hearing of the petition the wife in evidence denied that she had committed adultery on the specific occasions alleged. Counsel for the husband then sought to ask her the question : “Have you ever committed adultery ?”

HELD : the wife, having given evidence in chief in rebuttal of the specific charges of adultery, could properly be asked in cross-examination whether or not she had been guilty of any other acts of adultery.

[AS TO LIABILITY TO ANSWER QUESTIONS TENDING TO SHOW ADULTERY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 735, 736, para. 1138 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 430-432, Nos. 4383-4403.]

PETITION by husband for divorce on the ground of adultery.

The petition alleged that the respondent wife “on divers dates unknown and in a place or places unknown to the petitioner has committed adultery with a man or men unknown to the petitioner”, and, later, particulars were given of certain specific charges. At the hearing of the petition the wife denied that she had committed adultery on the occasions specified in the particulars and in cross-examination counsel for the husband put to her the question : “Have you ever committed adultery ?” This question was objected to on the grounds that, in view of the provisions of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 198, it was not permissible to put a question as to adultery which was not specifically charged unless the question went to credit. WILLMER, J., held that the question was admissible.

Salmon, K.C., and Baskerville for the husband.

Karminski, K.C., and Trevor Reeve for the wife.

WILLMER, J. : The question which it is proposed to ask is a proper question, but, in view of the importance of the matter, I will state my reasons for coming to that conclusion.

By para. 7 of his petition the husband alleges :

“ . . . that the respondent on divers dates unknown and in a place or places unknown to the petitioner has committed adultery with a man or men unknown to the petitioner.”

That allegation was put on the file over six years ago, and, not unnaturally, it invited a request for particulars, the answers to which, in due course, prompted an inquiry for further particulars. In answer to the first request for particulars

A the husband stated that the wife had constantly spent her evenings away from home in the company of other men and had boasted to the husband of her adultery with divers men and attributed her pregnancy to adultery. The husband was asked to give further particulars of the occasions on which she boasted of adultery. The husband gave particulars enumerating the number of occasions when the wife was alleged to have boasted. Certain later particulars gave details of one or two specific allegations of adultery which the wife was alleged to have committed, but the general position under para. 7 remained as it was stated in the petition. The wife has given evidence in chief denying the specific charges of adultery and the allegation that she boasted of adultery. In cross-examination counsel for the husband seeks to ask the question: "Have you ever committed adultery?", and to that question objection is taken by counsel for the wife, who contends that, having regard to the terms of s. 198 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, it is not an admissible question.

B It seems to me that the question depends on what is meant by the words "the alleged adultery" which are used in s. 198 of the Judicature Act. In my judgment, "the alleged adultery" must mean the adultery alleged in the petition and that adultery in the present case is adultery which amounts to a course of conduct pursued over a number of years, that is to say, the husband charges the wife generally with being a promiscuous woman and with committing adultery with various men at various times in various places. The fact that he has been required to give particulars of certain specified occasions does not seem to me to detract from the generality of the allegation made in the petition. It is contended by counsel for the wife that the effect of the particulars delivered is to tie the husband down to the occasions mentioned in the particulars. In my judgment, that is not so. The general allegation remains and if the wife feels embarrassed by a general allegation, not fully satisfied by particulars, it is always open to her to come to the court and obtain an order either striking out the general words of the allegation or limiting the husband in his evidence to the acts complained of in the particulars. No such step has been taken in this case, and no attempt has been made by the wife to get rid of the first allegation in the petition. From what I have seen of the case so far I think it is plain that had such an application been made it would not have succeeded and that is the reason why it was not made. The fact is that this is a very exceptional case where the husband, instead of alleging particular acts of adultery about which he has specific evidence, is forced to rely on what he contends is a long course of conduct. In this case it seems to me that that is "the alleged adultery," and, in my judgment, the wife, having given evidence in chief in rebuttal of various specific acts of adultery suggested against her, can properly be asked in cross-examination whether or not she has been guilty of any other acts of adultery, and I rule that the question is admissible.

E F Solicitors: James & Charles Dodd (for the husband); J. H. Bueno de Mesquita (for the wife).

G [Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

MACKRELL v. MACKRELL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ., and Harman, J.), October 21, 22, 1948.]

Condonation—Cruelty—Wife remaining in the home after filing of her petition.

The parties were married in 1925. After 1939 there was no marital intercourse, and in 1941 they ceased to share the same bedroom, there being trouble between the husband and wife due to the husband's attentions to another woman. In 1943, the husband attacked his wife putting his hands round her neck and swearing at her. In 1945, the husband again lost his temper and put his hands round her neck with such violence as to leave marks on her neck. The parties continued to live in the same house, but the wife consulted her solicitors with a view to the execution of a deed of separation. This proposal was abandoned after a further act of cruelty had occurred on Oct. 20, 1946, when the husband struck the wife a violent blow in the eye. The wife again consulted her solicitors and on Nov. 12, 1946, a petition for judicial separation on the grounds of cruelty was filed. The wife continued to live in the house. In February, 1947, the husband filed an answer denying the cruelty. On May 3, 1948, the petition was dismissed on the ground that the wife had condoned the husband's offence.

HELD: the fact that the wife continued to stay in the house after she had filed her petition was not necessarily proof of forgiveness and there was, therefore, no condonation.

Per DENNING, L.J.: Reconciliation does not take place unless and until mutual trust and confidence are restored. It is not to be expected that the parties can ever recapture the mutual devotion which existed when they were first married, but their relationship must be restored, by mutual consent, to a settled rhythm in which the past offences, if not forgotten, at least no longer rankle and embitter their daily lives. Then, and not until then, are the offences condoned.

Reconciliation being the test of condonation, nothing short of it will suffice. The fact that the parties continue to live in the same house or the fact that the guilty party is reinstated in his or her former position is, indeed, evidence from which reconciliation may be inferred, but it is by no means conclusive. Attempts to effect a reconciliation do not amount to condonation.

Dictum of VISCOUNT SIMON in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin ([1944] 1 All E.R. 44, 45; [1944] A.C. 49, 53; 170 L.T. 84, 85), applied.

Wilmot v. Wilmot and Martin ([1948] 2 All E.R. 123), considered and distinguished.

[AS TO CONDONATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 679-682, paras 1004-1009; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 336-342, Nos. 3161-3223.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Wilmot v. Wilmot and Martin, [1948] 2 All E.R. 123; [1948] L.J.R. 1336.
- (2) Keats v. Keats and Montezuma, (1859), 1 Sw. & Tr. 334; 28 L.J.P. & M. 57; 32 L.T.O.S. 321; 27 Digest 336, 3166.
- (3) Fearn v. Fearn, [1948] 1 All E.R. 459; [1948] P. 241; [1948] L.J.R. 1043.
- (4) Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin, [1944] 1 All E.R. 44; [1944] A.C. 49; 113 L.J.P. 1; 170 L.T. 84; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Snow v. Snow, (1842), 2 Notes of Cases, Supp. i; 27 Digest 342, 3231.

APPEAL by a wife, Amy Eleanor Mackrell, from an order of HODSON, J., dismissing her petition for a judicial separation in which she alleged cruelty by her husband, Frank Albert Mackrell, on the ground that she had condoned the offence. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal. The facts appear in the headnote.

Norman Parkes for the wife.

Travers for the husband.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal by a wife, Amy Eleanor Mackrell, from an order of HODSON, J., dismissing her petition for a judicial separation on the ground of the cruelty of her husband, Frank Albert Mackrell. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the facts and continued:] The judge dismissed the petition on the ground of condonation, and his judgment on that part of the case is as follows:

"I ought perhaps to deal with the last incident [on Oct. 20, 1946] in this connection, because when the husband smacked her face her eye was hurt. She says he was sorry, and I asked her if she accepted his apology and she said: 'Yes.' But when she explained the matter further she said: 'Well, I said I cannot go on like this much longer.' Afterwards he apologised, and she went down and carried on with the preparation of a meal for him. So, it does not necessarily follow that anything which she did immediately after was tantamount to a condonation or even an expression of forgiveness of her husband for this past particular incident. But her conduct afterwards, from October, 1946, until today is a matter which this court has to consider very carefully, to see whether she can possibly be held not to have condoned the acts of cruelty of which she now complains. She has deliberately remained in this house ever since, preparing her husband's meals, doing washing, mending, sitting down to meals with him and living with him in the ordinary sense of the word, except that they have been occupying separate rooms and that the situation between them has been abnormal, in that these proceedings, which were taken by the wife in November, 1946, have been in suspense, both parties knowing that in due course, presumably, if nothing happened to prevent it, the case would come to trial. No doubt, there was no conversation beyond that which has been suggested between them during that time, but I find it impossible in the circumstances of this case (I am not saying there might not be circumstances where a different conclusion might not be arrived at) to say that she has not condoned the conduct of her husband by remaining with him in the house as she has for all this length of time . . . The wife said, when she was asked why she stayed on: 'I stayed on because my home was a partnership'—meaning by that that she was not going to give up her interest either in the furniture or the occupation of the house in which she has lived and to which she has a claim, because, as she says, she provided some of the principal out of her own income. But I do not think she can be heard to say: 'I stayed on for eighteen months after the last act of which I complained. Although the petition was launched, I carried on and did not do anything to alter the situation, but I have not condoned.' I think her conduct speaks volumes. She cannot avoid the natural consequences of her own action by saying that she would not forgive her husband, or that she never intended to forgive him."

With great respect to the learned judge, I think that the error in his judgment is that he has not drawn sufficient distinction between the three weeks which elapsed between the last act of cruelty and the filing of the petition and the eighteen months thereafter before the case came on for hearing. There is a fundamental distinction between those two periods, because once the wife filed her petition for judicial separation it seems to me very unlikely that after that time she has forgiven her husband or been reconciled to him or that the offence of cruelty has been blotted out merely because she continued to live in the same house as before although her husband also lived there. To establish condonation in this case, I think one must find condonation during the three weeks between the last act of cruelty and the filing of the petition. The learned judge himself indicated that, if that were the only point, he would not be prepared to find condonation, and I certainly would not. The mere fact that she stayed on in the house does not seem to me to show forgiveness. She, no doubt, could have found some other place to which to go. On the other hand, she was entitled to stay in the house to protect her property in it until the lawyers had come to some agreement as to what was to be done with the house. She may well have expected that her husband, after the last assault and apology, would, at any rate for a time, behave reasonably to her. I cannot see any evidence of condonation before or after the filing of the petition.

A decision of WILLMER, J., in Wilmot v. Wilmot and Martin (1) was cited to us. The facts were that in November, 1945, the husband suspected that his wife had been guilty of adultery. On Dec. 9, while away from home, the husband wrote to the wife asking her to make it up with him and to give up the co-respondent. When the husband returned home on Dec. 11, the wife confessed that she had committed adultery with the co-respondent, and she said that she still loved the co-respondent and refused the husband's attempt at reconciliation. On learning this, the husband took no action of any kind and he and his wife continued to live together in the same way as they had been doing hitherto, i.e., without sexual intercourse, until July, 1946, when the husband left the wife. There was an interval in that case of seven months between the confession of adultery and the husband's departure. That seems to me to be a substantially different case from that with which we are dealing where the interval between the last act of cruelty—an act which revived all the previous cruelty—and the filing of the petition is only three weeks.

For these reasons in my judgment there is no evidence on which the court could properly find that the wife condoned the cruelty of her husband, and she, therefore, is entitled to a decree of separation.

DENNING, L.J. : I agree. It is not impossible for a woman to complain of cruelty while still residing in the same house as her husband. The legislature recognised that with regard to proceedings in the magistrates' courts, when they enacted in the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, s. 1 (1) that :

"An application by a married woman for an order . . . on the ground of cruelty . . . by her husband, may be made notwithstanding that the cruelty . . . complained of has not caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him . . ."

The reason is, that the wife may have nowhere else to go, or may not have the means to leave her husband until she gets the benefit of an order against him. The same is the position in the High Court. A wife may petition for a divorce or a judicial separation although she is still residing in the same house as her husband, but the question always arises in such a case whether she has condoned the offence. Of all the tests of condonation the one which I find most helpful is that stated by LORD CHELMSFORD, L.C., in Keats v. Keats and Montezuma (2), where he said (1859), 1 Sw. & Tr. 357) :

" . . the forgiveness which is to take away the husband's right to a divorce must not fall short of reconciliation. . . "

Reconciliation does not take place unless and until mutual trust and confidence are restored. It is not to be expected that the parties can ever recapture the mutual devotion which existed when they were first married, but their relationship must be restored, by mutual consent, to a settled rhythm in which the past offences, if not forgotten, at least no longer rankle and embitter their daily lives. Then, and not till then, are the offences condoned.

Reconciliation being the test of condonation, nothing short of it will suffice. The fact that the parties continue to live in the same house or the fact that the guilty party is reinstated in his or her former position is, indeed, evidence from which reconciliation may be inferred, but it is by no means conclusive. The longer the parties continue together and the closer their relationship, the stronger, of course, is the evidence of reconciliation; but cases often arise where the parties continue to live in the same house by force of circumstances. The wife may have nowhere else to go, or the innocent party may continue or reinstate the guilty one in his or her former position in an attempt at reconciliation. If in such cases the continuance or reinstatement were held to amount to condonation, it would mean that innocent parties would be deterred from attempting reconciliation: for, if an innocent party should feel that any attempt to mend the marriage would involve condoning the offence—and the consequent cancellation of his grounds for divorce—he would be reluctant to try it. He could not be sure that the attempt would be successful, and, rather than commit himself forever to an unhappy marriage, he would not embark on the attempt. Moreover, in those cases in which an innocent party was not deterred, but made a genuine attempt at reconciliation which failed, it would enable the guilty party to insist on keeping the marriage in existence when it would probably be better dissolved—a marriage which had been rendered unhappy by his or her wrongdoing. In my opinion, therefore, attempts to effect a reconciliation do not amount to condonation unless and until a reconciliation is actually achieved. The only exception to this is the positive rule that one act of sexual intercourse by a husband, with full knowledge of his wife's guilt, is conclusive evidence of condonation, but as BUCKNILL, L.J., said in Fearn v. Fearn (3), that is because of the serious prejudice to the wife that may thereby be occasioned. She may have a child in consequence of it.

I wish to say a word about Wilmot v. Wilmot (1). Both parties were there seeking a divorce and it may well have been right that the wife should have been granted the decree because the first act of adultery perpetrated by the husband seems to have been the cause of all the trouble, but, if and in so far as the judge held that the continuance of strained relations, without reconciliation, amounted to condonation, I cannot agree with him. However, that case is very different from the present case. Here the wife did not stay on in the house doing nothing. She issued a petition for judicial separation. As she said, she hoped that her home would “brighten up,” that is, she hoped for a reconciliation, but it never came. There was, therefore, no condonation. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

HARMAN, J. : I agree that the appeal should be allowed. I am content to accept the judge's finding that there was cruelty justifying a decree. That leaves the issue of condonation. Condonation implies a reinstatement of the husband, and we are told that this occurred within the 24 hours following the last offence in October, 1946, but the offended party must be allowed more time for reflexion than that, and the wife here put her petition on the file within 3 weeks or so and so acted with reasonable expedition, and, by waiting in the home for that time, she did not condone the offence. That a continuance in the matrimonial home is not necessarily condonation is shown by the speech of VISCOUNT SIMON in Henderson v. Henderson and Crellin (4), where he says ([1944] 1 All E.R. 45):

“In Snow v. Snow (5), DR. LUSHINGTON discusses at length whether, where a husband has been guilty of cruelty, a wife can ever maintain a suit where cohabitation was continued after the last act, and he concludes that subsequent cohabitation is not universally a bar to the wife's suit for the reason above stated.”

The “reason above stated” was the difficulty of the wife's situation. That being so, it seems to me, as, indeed, I think it seemed to the learned judge, that there was no condonation in the sense of reinstatement down to the date when the petition was put on the file. After that date, for the reasons given by BUCKNILL, L.J., I cannot see that it can possibly count against the wife that the court takes some time to bring the matter to fruition. Unless one regards the petition as a sham, of which there is no evidence here, one must take it to have been a final declaration on her part that there was no reconciliation and no reinstatement. In that attitude she has persisted, although she remained in the house as long as was necessary to bring this case to trial.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Baylis, Pearce & Co., agents for Stevens & Stevens, Farnham (for the wife); Johnson, Weatherall & Co., agents for Potter, Crundwell & Bridge, Farnham (for the husband).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WINNAN v. WINNAN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Morton of Henryton, Bucknill and Lord THOLOMEW v. BARTHOLOMEW. [1948] 2 All E.R. 1035.)] Explained and Distinguished.

Desertion—Res judicata—Order obtained by wife for wilful neglect to maintain—Allegation of desertion by husband—Subsequent petition for divorce by husband on ground of desertion based on same facts.

On May 29, 1945, a wife took out a summons in a court of summary jurisdiction complaining that her husband had wilfully neglected to maintain her and their infant child, and asking that an order be made that she be no longer bound to cohabit with the husband. She also claimed custody of the child and reasonable maintenance. The husband defended the proceedings in person, alleging constructive desertion by the wife, but an order was made against him as claimed by the wife. By a petition dated Apr. 17, 1947, the husband sought a decree of divorce on the grounds of cruelty and desertion by the wife, the charge of desertion being based on the same facts as those relied on by the husband before the justices. In her defence, the wife argued that (1) the husband had condoned the cruelty; (2) the facts proved did not amount to desertion; (3) the allegations as to desertion were res judicata. The Court of Appeal found that the cruelty had been condoned, but that constructive desertion of which the wife was guilty revived the cruelty, and as to the third defence:

HELD: as constructive desertion would be a defence to a charge of wilful neglect to maintain, the justices must have applied their minds to that question and their order proved that they decided that the wife was not guilty of the constructive desertion, but the allegations in the petition for divorce did not thereby become res judicata for otherwise the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court would be impaired.

Finney v. Finney (1868) (L.R. 1 P. & D. 483; 18 L.T. 489), Harriman v. Harriman ([1909] P. 123; 100 L.T. 557), Kara v. Kara ([1948] 2 All E.R. 16; [1948] P. 287), James v. James ([1948] 1 All E.R. 214) and Pratt v. Pratt (1927) (137 L.T. 491), considered.

Observations of LORD SHAW in Hoystead v. Commr. of Taxation ([1926] A.C. 170; 134 L.T. 359), and rule laid down by WIGRAM, V.-C., in Henderson v. Henderson (1843) (3 Hare 100, 114; 1 L.T.O.S. 410), applied.

[AS TO RES JUDICATA, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 410-414, paras. 465-469; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 21, pp. 159-226, Nos. 213-593.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Richardson v. Richardson, (1942), 167 L.T. 260 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Papadopoulos v. Papadopoulos, [1930] P. 55 ; 99 L.J.P. 1 ; 142 L.T. 237 ; 94 J.P. 39 ; Digest Supp.
- (3) Hoystead v. Taxation Commissioner, [1926] A.C. 155 ; 94 L.J.P.C. 79 ; 134 L.T. 354 ; Digest Supp.
- A (4) Henderson v. Henderson, (1843), 3 Hare 100 ; 1 L.T.O.S. 410 ; 21 Digest 174, 276.
- (5) Finney v. Finney, (1868), L.R. 1 P. & D. 483 ; 37 L.J.P. & M. 43 ; 18 L.T. 489 ; 27 Digest 324, 3030.
- (6) Harriman v. Harriman, [1909] P. 123 ; 78 L.J.P. 62 ; 100 L.T. 557 ; 73 J.P. 193 ; 27 Digest 321, 2995.
- B (7) Kara v. Kara, [1948] 2 All E.R. 16 ; [1948] P. 287 ; [1948] L.J.R. 1741.
- (8) James v. James, [1948] 1 All E.R. 214.
- (9) Gooch v. Gooch, [1893] P. 99 ; 62 L.J.P. 73 ; 68 L.T. 462 ; 27 Digest 368, 3548.
- (10) Hudson v. Hudson, [1948] 1 All E.R. 773 ; [1948] P. 292 ; [1948] L.J.R. 907.
- C (11) Pratt v. Pratt, (1927), 96 L.J.P. 123 ; 137 L.T. 491 ; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by a wife from an order of CASSELS, J., dated Dec. 12, 1947, granting a decree nisi of divorce to the husband on the grounds of cruelty and constructive desertion. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

M. P. Picard for the wife.

D E. A. Jessel for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 28. BUCKNILL, L.J., read the following judgment. The petition is dated Apr. 17, 1947, and the desertion is alleged to have started on Apr. 10, 1944. The wife by her answer denied the cruelty, and, alternatively, alleged condonation of it. She also denied the desertion. Counsel for the wife did not dispute the finding of cruelty. His points were that : (1) the husband had condoned the cruelty ; (2) the facts proved by the husband did not amount to desertion by the wife ; (3) the allegations as to desertion were res judicata, and the husband was estopped from relying on them in support of his petition.

The parties were married in 1920, and lived together for some 22 years. There were three children of the marriage, Gordon, born in 1923, Brian, born in 1928, and Betty, born in 1930. The marriage was made unhappy through frequent quarrels owing to the wife's habit of unjustly accusing the husband of committing adultery or behaving indecently with various women whom he met from time to time. I need not detail these incidents. They were so frequent and so grievous that they gradually affected the husband's health. It is clear that the evidence of the husband on this part of the case, evidence which the judge accepted, proved cruelty by the wife. In October, 1942, the husband was in bad health owing to this conduct of the wife, and he applied to the National Service Officer for work away from Twickenham, where he and his wife were living, and was directed to work at Hove. At that time the wife had recently taken to keeping cats, and according to the husband she had at that time six or seven. This number greatly increased after the husband went to Hove. When he was at his home at Twickenham for a short visit at Easter, 1944, there were 25 to 30 cats there. His last visit ended about Apr. 10, 1944. According to his evidence, which the judge accepted, the cats were allowed to roam all over the house, a small building with two bedrooms upstairs and a lounge, bathroom, dining room and kitchenette downstairs. The house smelt very badly from the excretions of the cats. When the husband asked the wife to get rid of the cats, and set up home together again and make a fresh start, the wife replied that she loved her cats and preferred them to her husband. The learned judge sums up the position at Easter, 1944, in these words :

"I am satisfied that the husband is right when he says that the presence of these cats, coupled with her conduct, made life utterly intolerable for him in that house, and so he left, and since that day he has never been back to the matrimonial home."

He continued to pay his wife an allowance until October, 1944, and to pay the rent of the house until May, 1945.

The cruelty of the wife in making false accusations against her husband came to an end in October, 1942, when the husband left the home for Hove and only made occasional visits thereafter to his wife. During these visits he and his wife had marital intercourse, so that he thereby condoned those acts of cruelty. The last act of intercourse was in March, 1944. If, however, the keeping of the cats and the wife's refusal in 1944 to abate the nuisance amounted to a matrimonial offence, then such offences would, in my opinion, revive the acts of cruelty which ended in October, 1942. Counsel for the wife argued that the presence of the cats did not justify the husband leaving his wife and suggested that it was a mere pretext to get away from her, but on this point I think there was abundant evidence that the refusal of the wife to get rid of the cats was conduct which drove the husband finally from the matrimonial home. In these circumstances, the judge held that, although there was condonation of the previous acts of cruelty by reason of the sexual intercourse up to March, 1944, her later conduct in preferring her cats to him and insisting on their intolerable presence in the house was a matrimonial offence amounting to constructive desertion. I agree with the decision of CASSELS, J., on this point. In my opinion, such constructive desertion has also revived the condoned cruelty just as much as active desertion would have done.

Subject, therefore, to the point as to res judicata, I think that the husband is entitled to a decree of divorce both on the grounds of cruelty and of desertion. Counsel for the wife argued that the issue whether the wife had been guilty of desertion was res judicata for the following reasons. He said, in the first place, that the question whether the wife had deserted the husband was directly raised in certain proceedings by the wife against the husband in a court of summary jurisdiction. Those proceedings started with a summons taken out by the wife on May 29, 1945, in the petty sessional division of Brentford. The material part of the summons is as follows:

"Complaint has been made by your wife, Edith Amelia Winnan, of 20, Waverly Avenue, Twickenham, Middlesex, for that you have wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her your said wife and her infant child whom you are legally liable to maintain, Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925. Wherefore your wife, pursuant to the statute in that case made and provided, applies that an order may be made That she be no longer bound to cohabit with you. That the legal custody of the child of the marriage between your wife and you, namely Betty Wilfreds born on Aug. 7, 1930, while under the age of sixteen years be committed to her. That you shall pay to her such weekly sum not exceeding £2 as the court shall consider reasonable."

It appears from the evidence of the husband before CASSELS, J., that he defended those proceedings, but had no legal assistance, so his counsel informed this court. Before CASSELS, J., the husband gave the following answers in cross-examination as to what took place before the justices:

"Q.—As soon as you gave up sending her any money she took out a police court summons against you?

A.—Yes.

Q.—You defended it, did you not?

A.—Yes. I was called to the court.

Q.—Did you not try to put very much the same facts as you are putting to the court today?

A.—I did.

Q.—And the court then decided against you?

A.—10s. per week."

A The summons was heard on July 11, 1945, when the justices made an order for the husband to pay the wife 10s. a week for the maintenance of the wife and 5s. a week for the maintenance of her daughter.

B Counsel for the wife, in his careful and able argument before this court, argued that the justices could not properly have held the husband guilty of wilful neglect to maintain if the wife had deserted him at the time when such neglect was alleged, and that they must be presumed to have considered the question of such desertion and to have decided the point in the wife's favour, because they made the order of 10s. a week. Counsel argued that, therefore, the justices had adjudicated on the issue of the wife's desertion, that the matter was res judicata, and that the husband could not allege desertion on the same facts in subsequent divorce proceedings. He further argued that there could be no revival of the earlier condoned cruelty by reason of the subsequent alleged desertion of the wife because the issue of that desertion had already been decided C adversely to the husband by the justices and was res judicata.

D Counsel for the husband took the following points. (1) The plea of res judicata was not pleaded. (2) The question whether the wife was guilty of constructive desertion was irrelevant on a summons by her for maintenance on the ground of wilful neglect. (3) Even if the justices had decided that the wife had not been guilty of desertion, nevertheless such a finding would not be a bar to the husband subsequently filing a petition for divorce and alleging such desertion. As regards the first point, counsel for the wife relied on the fact that the petition of the husband referred to these proceedings before the justices. This had to be done in accordance with the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 4 (1) (f). In my opinion, this reference in the petition of the husband does not raise by necessary inference the question of res judicata, and the wife should have raised it expressly in her answer. The result of its absence from the pleadings was that E neither side put before CASSELS, J., any note of the evidence before the justices, or of the reasons, if any, for their decision, or any proof that they had in their minds, when arriving at their decision, the issue whether the wife had been guilty of desertion. Under these circumstances, counsel for the husband might properly have asked for an adjournment before CASSELS, J., to deal with the plea F of res judicata on the ground that he was taken by surprise. He did not do so, but was content to leave the matter to the decision of the judge. CASSELS, J., in his judgment on this point, said: "It was said on behalf of the wife that this was res judicata. The first thing that one has to point out is that that is not pleaded." I do not think that in all the circumstances this failure in pleading is an effective bar to the point being taken at the trial, and do not think that the G wife should be debarred from arguing the point of res judicata before this court.

H The second point for our decision is whether the defence of constructive desertion by the wife would have been a good defence to the wife's claim for maintenance on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain. There is authority for saying that active desertion by the wife without cause would be a good defence: see Richardson v. Richardson (1), a decision of the Divisional Court composed of HENN COLLINS, J., and myself, in which the court followed the dicta of HILL, J., in Papadopoulos v. Papadopoulos (2). In my opinion, a husband is not guilty of wilful neglect to maintain a wife who has without cause deserted him and is in a state of desertion at the material time, and I think the same rule applies to the case where a wife has without cause driven her husband out of the house. I, therefore, feel bound to hold that, if the justices tried the case properly, as I presume they did, they must have applied their minds to the question whether the wife had been guilty of constructive desertion and its legal effect on her claim for maintenance, and that their order of 10s. a week proves that they decided that the wife had not been guilty of constructive desertion.

I now turn to the third point, namely, whether such a decision by the justices estops the husband from subsequently petitioning for a divorce on the ground of such desertion. The scope of the rule of res judicata is stated in Hoystead v. Taxation Commissioner (3), in the judgment of the Judicial Committee, delivered by LORD SHAW ([1926] A.C. 170):

"It is seen from this citation of authority that if in any court of competent jurisdiction a decision is reached, a party is estopped from questioning it in a new legal proceeding. But the principle also extends to any point, whether of assumption or admission, which was in substance the ratio of and fundamental to the decision. The rule on this subject was set forth in the leading case of Henderson v. Henderson (4), by WIGRAM, V.-C., as follows (3 Hare 114): 'I believe I state the rule of the court correctly when I say, that where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not (except under special circumstances) permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward, only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. The plea of res judicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time.' This authority has been frequently referred to and followed, and is settled law."

It will be seen that no distinction is drawn here between decisions of acquittal and decisions of conviction.

In Finney v. Finney (5), a wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty and adultery. About a year before, the wife had filed a petition for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty and the allegations of cruelty in that petition were the same as those set out in the petition for divorce. The petition for judicial separation had been heard, the evidence of cruelty given, and the judge ultimately found that the husband had not been guilty of cruelty, and dismissed the petition. The husband demurred to the allegations of cruelty being raised again in the second petition, and his objection was upheld. The Judge Ordinary, LORD PENZANCE, in the course of his judgment said (L.R. 1 P. & D. 484):

"In all the cases cited the question raised was, either to what extent one court is to be bound by the judgment of another court, or how far a court is to give effect to a decision on certain facts pronounced in some other suit of a wholly different nature. But the questions of fact raised in this case are precisely the same as those which were inquired into and determined in a previous suit in this very court. In both suits the husband is charged with the same matrimonial offence, that of cruelty. That issue having been tried, and found in the husband's favour in the former suit, the wife now seeks to have it tried over again, and it is argued that she is entitled to reiterate those identical charges, because she has tacked on them a charge of adultery. I think that cannot be allowed. According to the practice of every court, after a matter has once been put in issue and tried, and there has been a finding or a verdict on that issue, and thereupon a judgment, such finding and judgment is conclusive between the same parties on that issue. In all courts it would be treated as an estoppel."

If the principle applied in Finney's case (5) is to be strictly applied to proceedings before a court of summary jurisdiction, followed by proceedings in the Divorce Court, a previous finding of guilt should also act as an estoppel and prevent the guilty spouse from denying his guilt in answer to a divorce petition, but the Divorce Court cannot be estopped, as was pointed out in Harriman v. Harriman (6), and in the recent case of Kara v. Kara (7) in the Court of Appeal. In Kara v. Kara (7) the husband petitioned for a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. The wife by her answer denied the adultery and petitioned for a divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty. Before the divorce proceedings started the wife had taken out a summons against the husband on a charge of cruelty and had obtained an order in her favour. The facts as to the cruelty then charged were substantially the same as those on which the charge of cruelty was based in the wife's petition. Mr. COMMISSIONER TYNDALE held that the wife had not committed adultery and that the husband had been guilty of cruelty, but the Court of Appeal (LORD GREENE, M.R., myself and HODSON, J.) reversed this decision and held that the wife had been guilty of cruelty. The Court of Appeal did not consider that the finding of cruelty by the stipendiary magistrate estopped the divorce court from finding that there had been no cruelty. LORD GREENE, M.R., in the course of his judgment said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 17):

"A finding of a court of summary jurisdiction against one of the parties to a divorce suit who is accused of a matrimonial offence may be admitted as evidence that he or she has committed the offence charged, but, in our opinion, this does not absolve the court from examining the evidence given at the trial on the issues there raised. In the result, notwithstanding the decision of the stipendiary magistrate, the charge of cruelty is not proved to our satisfaction, and the findings of the learned commissioner on this issue must also be reversed."

Counsel for the wife argued that, although no estoppel of the parties binds the divorce court, this principle only applies where a spouse has been found guilty of a matrimonial offence, and does not apply where he or she has been acquitted of such offence. There is no direct authority for this proposition. LORD MERRIMAN, P., in James v. James (8), pointed out ([1948] 1 All E.R. 217) that:

"... there may be a marked distinction in this respect between a judgment (whether it be a judgment of a court of summary jurisdiction or of the High Court) which finds a particular offence proved and where it becomes necessary to investigate the truth of that finding in some subsequent proceedings, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, a case where the High Court has dismissed the charge."

After referring to the decisions in Harriman v. Harriman (6) and Gooch v. Gooch (9), LORD MERRIMAN, P., continued:

"When it is a question of seeking to oblige a court to decide something contrary to its own belief on the facts because some other court has decided in the affirmative, there is the consideration that so to oblige the court would be running contrary to the statutory duties imposed on the court, whereas where a party who has already been defeated in bringing a claim for relief is trying to do exactly the same thing again, the same consideration does not apply to prevent him from being estopped from bringing that evidence before the court at all."

LORD MERRIMAN, P., mentioned the point again in Hudson v. Hudson (10). In that case a Divisional Court had affirmed a decision of the court of summary jurisdiction that the husband had been guilty of cruelty. The wife subsequently petitioned for a divorce in respect of the same cruelty, the husband in his answer to the petition denied the cruelty, and the wife in her reply pleaded that the husband was estopped from denying the cruelty by virtue of the previous decision. LORD MERRIMAN, P., held that there was no estoppel in accordance with the principle laid down in Harriman v. Harriman (6), but again expressed a doubt "whether there is or is not a distinction to be drawn between a judgment dismissing a cause of complaint and a judgment finding that the cause of complaint is proved," and indicated two reasons for such a distinction ([1948] 1 All E.R. 775):

"The first is that in Harriman v. Harriman (6) no doubt was expressed about the correctness of the decision in Finney v. Finney (5) . . . Secondly, it may well be that, if a party is estopped by the earlier decision, the estoppel may operate to prevent that party from bringing the same charge at all before any other court, whereas the doctrine of estoppel will not operate so as to abrogate the statutory duty of the court to inquire into the truth of a petition which is properly brought before it. I need only add that the decision of the Divisional Court in Pratt v. Pratt (11) supports the view that an earlier dismissal of a charge may be conclusive."

In Pratt v. Pratt (11) a judge of assize dismissed a petition by the husband for a divorce on the ground of the wife's alleged adultery although a court of summary jurisdiction had found that the wife had been guilty of adultery and had, accordingly, revoked a separation order which they had previously made in the wife's favour. The wife, after succeeding in her defence in the divorce proceedings, then made an application to the justices to restore the order which they had formerly made in her favour, and the justices did so. That case seems to show that the finding of the judge of the High Court that the wife had not committed adultery is res judicata and conclusive in subsequent proceedings before a court of summary jurisdiction. It does not decide that, if there had been a previous finding by the court of summary jurisdiction that the wife had not committed adultery, such finding would have estopped the husband from petitioning for a divorce on the ground of the same adultery.

When the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, created the divorce court with its original and unique jurisdiction of granting a decree of divorce on proof of certain matrimonial offences there was no court of summary jurisdiction in existence with jurisdiction to grant relief to a wife from her husband for wilful neglect to maintain her. Mere desertion as a ground for divorce was first established by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, which enacted that a petition for divorce may be presented to the High Court either by the husband or the wife on the ground that the respondent has deserted the petitioner without cause for a period of at least three years preceding the presentation of the petition. Other sections of that Act enact that on a petition for desertion the court shall not be bound to pronounce a decree of divorce and may dismiss the petition if the petitioner has during the marriage been guilty of adultery or has been guilty of such wilful neglect or misconduct as has conduced to the desertion. The Act does not confer any jurisdiction on the court to make any decree or order against a husband on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain his wife. When the Act of 1937 was passed, the wife had a statutory right under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 4, exercisable before a court of summary jurisdiction, to claim an order for maintenance on the ground of the husband's wilful neglect to maintain her. Section 6 of the Act of 1895 also enacts that :

"No orders shall be made under this Act on the application of a married woman if it shall be proved that such married woman has committed an act of adultery ; Provided that the husband has not condoned or connived at, or by his wilful neglect or misconduct conduced to such act of adultery."

The statute does not state that the court shall not make an order in the wife's favour if she has herself without cause deserted the husband, neither does the statute give any remedy to the husband against his wife on the ground of her desertion. Now, if the argument of res judicata put forward by the wife in the present case is to prevail the right given by the statute of 1937 to the husband for a decree of divorce on the ground of his wife's desertion will be of no value to him because the order of the justices against the husband incidentally and by inference also decided that his wife was not in desertion at the time when the order was made. Can it be said in these circumstances that the issue of the wife's desertion, assumed to have been considered by the justices, and the right of the husband to petition for a divorce on the ground of her desertion is the "same subject of litigation" within the definition of res judicata by WIGRAM, V.-C., to which I have referred. So to hold would, in my opinion, lead to a very undesirable limitation on the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court. Many questions, such as adultery by the wife, condonation, connivance, or neglect or misconduct conducing to such adultery, may be raised before the justices, and if it is to be held that in every case where the justices have decided such a question the matter is res judicata, and that, therefore, the parties cannot raise it in proceedings in the Divorce Court (unless, indeed, the point is one governed by the rule in Harriman v. Harriman (6)), then I think that the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court would be grievously impaired. Take, for instance, the question of condonation of the wife's adultery. The justices, in proceedings by the wife for maintenance on the ground of her husband's wilful neglect to maintain, might hold that the wife had committed adultery but that the husband had condoned it, and accordingly might make an order. The husband then proceeds to file a petition for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery and the wife in her answer alleges condonation. Is the matter of condonation res judicata, and may not the husband in his reply allege that he did not condone it? If res judicata applies, then it seems to me that this is a serious impairment of the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court which under s. 4 of the Act of 1937 has the specific duty on a petition for divorce to inquire into the facts alleged and whether there has been any condonation by the petitioner.

The point is bare of authority and I do not find it easy to give any clear cut reason why the rule of res judicata should not apply here, but I am satisfied that those who first formulated the rule never intended it to apply in such a case as this. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed. LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON has authorised me to say that he has read this judgment and that he agrees with it.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed. No order with regard to costs.

Solicitors: L. H. Whitlamsmith, Law Society Divorce Department (for the wife); B. Bunker & Son, Hove (for the husband).

[Reported by C. St.J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Not followed. PERRING v. PERRING.
[1949] 2 All E.R. 334.

MAYO v. MAYO.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Mr. Commissioner Blanco White, K.C.), October 11, 1948.]

Adultery—Admission—Failure by wife to state name of father when registering birth of child—Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874 (c. 88), ss. 1, 7.

A wife gave birth to a child, and, on registering the birth, omitted to give information of the name and surname and rank or profession of the father.

HELD: the entry in the register of births omitting these particulars constituted an admissible admission of adultery.

Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell ([1941] 1 All E.R. 305; [1941] P. 24; 165 L.T. 48), applied.

[AS TO EVIDENCE OF ADULTERY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 660-664, paras. 973-976; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 294-299, Nos. 2708-2755.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell, [1941] 1 All E.R. 305 ; [1941] P. 24 ; 110 L.J.P. 20 ; 165 L.T. 48 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Russell v. Russell, [1924] A.C. 687 ; 93 L.J.P. 97 ; 131 L.T. 482 ; 27 Digest, 297, 2743.

UNDEFENDED PETITION by husband for divorce on the grounds of his wife's adultery.

MR. COMMISSIONER BLANCO WHITE decided that the wife's failure to supply the names of the father of a child, born during the marriage, for the purpose of the registration of the birth, amounted to an admission of adultery by her, and he granted the husband a decree nisi.

Quintin Hogg for the husband.

The wife was not represented.

MR. COMMISSIONER BLANCO WHITE, K.C. : This case raises a question which is important in practice and on which the diligence of counsel and my own inquiries have been unable to find any authority.

The question is this : If, on the registration of the birth of a child by a married woman, col. 4, of the form of register, which should contain the name and surname of the father, and col. 6, which should contain a statement of his rank or profession, are left blank, is that an admission by her of adultery ? At first sight one would say, "No," because all that has happened is that the mother has failed to give any information with regard to those matters, and from nothing, nothing can be deduced, but, when one looks at the provisions of the Births and Deaths Registration Acts, 1836 and 1874, and the regulations which deal with the registration of births, the position appears to be different.

Section 20 of the Act of 1836 provided that :

"The father or mother of every child born in England . . . shall, within 42 days next after the . . . birth, give information, upon being requested so to do, . . . of the several particulars hereby required to be known and registered touching the birth of such child."

To that Act there was annexed a schedule which showed the form in which, by s. 17 of the Act, the register books were to be printed, and that form contained, as does the form in use today, a column for the name and surname of the father and a column for his rank or profession. In the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, s. 1, it is provided that :

"In the case of every child born alive after the commencement of the Act, it shall be the duty of the father and mother of the child . . . to give to the registrar, within 42 days next after such birth, information of the particulars required to be registered concerning such birth, and in the presence of the registrar to sign the register."

By s. 7 it is provided :

"In the case of an illegitimate child no person shall, as father of such child, be required to give information under this Act concerning the birth of such child, and the registrar shall not enter in the register the name of any person as father of such child, unless at the joint request of the mother and of the person acknowledging himself to be the father of such child, and such person shall in such case sign the register, together with the mother."

I have seen the register in this case and am satisfied that all the requirements of the Act have been carefully observed by the registrar of births. The position, therefore, was that the wife attended to register the birth of the child and it was her duty, unless the child was illegitimate, to enter the name of the father and his rank or profession. It is not to be assumed that she would fail to comply with her duty. She did not enter the name and surname of the father, and that must mean, if one assumes she is doing her duty, either that she did not know who the father was, and, therefore, was unable to give the necessary particulars, or she was admitting that the child was illegitimate. Whichever view one takes following the decision in Frampton v. Frampton and Bushell (1), that is an admissible admission of adultery, and in so far as it is an expression of her opinion that the child is illegitimate the evidence is admissible under the rule in Russell v. Russell (2).

- A In the present case, when the wife was pregnant she was seen by her husband and a conversation took place from which the husband deduced that she admitted that she had committed adultery and, indeed, admitted that the child was illegitimate. On that conversation alone I should not have felt justified in acting, but, for the reasons I have given, I regard the entry in the register of births, which does not include the name of the father, as an admission of adultery, and with that evidence I am satisfied that adultery on her part is proved.
- B There will be a decree nisi.

Decree nisi.

Solicitors : Herbert Baron & Co. (for the husband).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

C

SHARP v. COATES.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), October 25, 26, 27, 1948.]

- D Land Charges—Registration—Estate contract—Yearly tenancy under written agreement—Undertaking to grant 10 years' lease—Landlord himself holding under yearly tenancy at time of agreement—Fee simple later vested in landlord—Validity of undertaking against purchaser of land—Land Charges Act, 1925 (c. 22), ss. 10 (1), Class C (iv), 13 (2).

- E By an agreement in writing, dated Apr. 13, 1944, R., the tenant from year to year of certain land of which his mother was the freeholder, sublet the land to the defendant on a yearly tenancy. The agreement contained the following provision : " In the event at any time during the continuance of this agreement of the reversion expectant upon this agreement becoming absolutely vested in " R., R. " will grant to " the defendant " a lease for a term of 10 years as from Oct. 11, 1943." This provision was not registered.
- F as a land charge under the Land Charges Act, 1925. In April, 1945, after the death of his mother, R. became the freeholder of the land, and in December, 1945, he sold it to the plaintiff. In September, 1946, the plaintiff gave the defendant notice to quit, but the defendant claimed that under his tenancy agreement he was entitled to demand a lease for 10 years :—

- G HELD : in 1944 R., as a tenant from year to year, was an " estate owner " within the meaning of the Land Charges Act, 1925, s. 10 (1), Class C (iv), and, therefore, the undertaking by R. to grant a lease to the defendant was capable of registration as a land charge ; as it had not been registered under s. 13 (2) of the Act it was void against a purchaser ; and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to give the defendant notice to quit.

- H Decision of HUMPHREYS, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 136), affirmed.

[AS TO ESTATE CONTRACTS REGISTRABLE AS LAND CHARGES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 19, p. 358, paras. 753, 754.

FOR THE LAND CHARGES ACT, 1925, ss. 10, 13 (2) and 20 (4), and THE LAW OF PROPERTY ACT, 1925, ss. 1 (1) and 205 (1) (v) and (xxvii), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 15, pp. 531-537, and 543, and pp. 177, 385 and 389.]

APPEAL by the defendant from a judgment of HUMPHREYS, J., dated Dec. 19, 1947, and reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 136.

Under a written agreement for a yearly tenancy, the tenant (the defendant) was entitled to the grant of a lease for 10 years in the event of the freehold of the property becoming vested, during the currency of the agreement, in the landlord, who himself held under a yearly tenancy agreement from his mother. The mother died, and the landlord, on becoming the freeholder, sold the land to the plaintiff, who brought this action to recover possession from the tenant. The tenant set up the term of his tenancy agreement. HUMPHREYS, J., held that, as the term was not registered as a land charge, it was void as against the plaintiff, who was, therefore, entitled to possession. The tenant appealed, but the Court of Appeal now dismissed his appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Jopling for the defendant.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and Hanbury Aggs for the plaintiff.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of HUMPHREYS, J., in an action brought by the plaintiff for recovery of land, and it raises what is said to be a short point under the Land Charges Act, 1925. It is one that has taken considerable time to argue, and it certainly is not easy.

On Apr. 13, 1944, one Walter Henry Racey granted a tenancy from year to year to Mr. Coates, the defendant in the action. It was a tenancy of something over 3 acres of land, which formed part of a larger holding, and we know now that at the time of the letting Racey's mother was the owner in fee of the whole property. The agreement contained a covenant—if I may use that expression with regard to a document which is not under seal—to this effect :

"In the event at any time during the continuance of this agreement of the reversion expectant upon this agreement becoming absolutely vested in the landlord the landlord will grant to the tenant a lease for a term of 10 years as from Oct. 11, 1943, upon the terms of this agreement so far as the same are applicable to a lease."

Mrs. Racey died in December, 1944, and on Apr. 29, 1945, the property was conveyed by her executors to Walter Henry Racey, who thereupon became the owner of the fee. After that time, Coates was entitled, if he was so minded at that time, to demand a lease for 10 years, but he did not do so. The property was then put up for auction by Racey. It did not sell by auction, but on Nov. 13, 1945, the plaintiff contracted to buy the property from Racey, and the purchase was completed on Dec. 11, 1945. Coates, meanwhile, had remained as a tenant from year to year. On Sept. 13, 1946, the plaintiff served a notice to quit on Coates, and Coates then set up that he was entitled under the terms of the written agreement under which he was holding from year to year to demand a lease for 10 years. The answer that the plaintiff makes to that claim is that the proviso in the written agreement was a contract which was caught by the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925, and, as it was not registered as a charge, it is void as against him, and that, whatever right Coates may have against Racey, that does not prevent the plaintiff, as the owner in fee of the property, from giving Coates notice to quit.

It is necessary, therefore, to refer, briefly as may be, to the provisions of the Land Charges Act, 1925. Section 10 (1) provides :

"The following classes of charges on, or obligations affecting, land may be registered as land charges in the register of land charges, namely . . ."

Then come various classes, and the class which is in question in this case is Class C (iv) :

"Any contract by an estate owner or by a person entitled at the date of the contract to have a legal estate conveyed to him to convey or create a legal estate . . ."

That is, any contract by an estate owner to create a legal estate. A term of years is a legal estate under the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 1 (1). By s. 13 (2) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, it is provided :

“A land charge of Class B, Class C or Class D, created or arising after the commencement of this Act, shall (except as hereinafter provided) be void as against a purchaser of the land charged therewith . . .”

A So, if the right under the proviso in the tenancy agreement is a land charge, it ought to have been registered, and, if it is not registered, it is void as against the purchaser whether he had notice or not. Then by s. 20 (4) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, it is provided that the expressions “estate owner,” “legal estate,” and so forth, have the same meaning as in the Law of Property Act, 1925. The Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 205 (1) (v), contains the following definition :
B “‘Estate owner’ means the owner of a legal estate . . .” and by s. 1 (1) of the Act :

“The only estates in land which are capable of subsisting or of being conveyed or created at law are—(a) An estate in fee simple absolute in possession ; (b) A term of years absolute.”

C By s. 205 (1) (xxvii) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the expression “Term of years absolute” is defined, and :

“ . . . in this definition the expression ‘term of years’ includes a term for less than a year, or for a year or years and a fraction of a year or from year to year.”

D A tenant from year to year can be, and is, an estate owner, because he has an estate for a term of years as defined by the Act.

The argument for the plaintiff put forward below, which HUMPHREYS, J., accepted, was that Racey, in the first instance, was an estate owner because he had a term of years, viz., a yearly tenancy from his mother. He purported to act as landlord in creating a yearly tenancy between himself and Coates. It may be true, as counsel for the plaintiff has argued, that, as between Racey and Coates, Coates, being the tenant, could not dispute the title of the landlord, i.e., the person who purported to act as landlord. That estoppel would not, I think, operate as between the plaintiff and Racey in this case, but, however that may be, it would seem that in the court below the case proceeded on the footing that there was this interest, at least, in Racey, viz., the yearly tenancy from his mother. No application was made to the court to adjourn, when this
E matter was brought up for the first time, that the matter might be further investigated. It could have been done, but the case proceeded on those lines, and, accordingly, we think that we must accept the position, a position that was very largely, no doubt, due to the fact that, for some reason on which the court has already commented, the plaintiff brought this action as an action under R.S.C., Ord. 14, and there were no full pleadings. The case was treated as a
G short cause, which it certainly was not. The court feels, however, that it is too late now to say that this matter should be further investigated. If Walter Racey was tenant from year to year from his mother, he was, as I have already shown by reference to the sections, an estate owner, and as an estate owner he made this contract to give Coates a 10-years lease if and when he became the owner of the fee. In other words, it is a case in which a man who has a
H limited interest in land contracts that, when he enlarges his interest and becomes the owner in fee, he will grant a term of years.

Counsel for the defendant contended that s. 10 (1), Class C (iv), of the Land Charges Act, 1925, must be read as meaning that the estate owner must at the time of his contract have an estate out of which the charge could operate, and in support of that argument he referred to s. 10 (2), which says :

“A land charge shall be registered in the name of the estate owner whose estate is intended to be affected . . .”

I think one comment that can be made on that contention is that s. 10 (2) merely directs in whose name the land charge shall be registered, but, further than that, it seems to me that, if a limited owner—using the words “limited” owner in the sense in which I have just indicated—does contract that if, during the continuance of the agreement which he has made with the other party to grant him a yearly tenancy, his interest becomes enlarged, he will grant him a larger interest, he is making an agreement which affects his interest as an estate owner. If that is so, it follows that the conclusion to which HUMPHREYS, J., came was right, because no requirement which ought to have been satisfied had been satisfied in this case, and, therefore, the charge was void, i.e., the contract which had been made by Racey with Coates could not be effectual as against the plaintiff, who was a purchaser for value.

Another point raised by counsel for the defendant was that the estate owner must be an estate owner at the time the contract was made. Counsel for the plaintiff said that the words in s. 10 (1), Class C (iv) :

“Any contract by an estate owner or by a person entitled at the date of the contract to have a legal estate conveyed to him . . .”

show that there is a contrast between the estate owner and the person who is merely entitled to have the legal estate conveyed to him. As I understand the argument of counsel for the plaintiff, it is that, if a man is an estate owner, it does not matter whether he was an estate owner at the time the contract was made or not. In view of the conclusions to which I have come, and which I have just expressed, that Racey was an estate owner at the time the agreement was made, and his estate was affected, it is not necessary to give a decision on this second point. I merely say that I think there is a great deal to be said for the argument of counsel for the defendant on this point.

For the reasons I have endeavoured to express on a not very easy point, I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of HUMPHREYS, J., was right, and that, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. The sole question on this appeal is whether the tenancy agreement of Apr. 13, 1944, was capable of registration. If it was, it is common ground that the appeal fails. It would be capable of registration, if at all, as an estate contract within s. 10 (1), Class C (iv), of the Land Charges Act, 1925. It will be an estate contract within that provision if it is a contract within the opening words of para. (iv), viz. :

“Any contract by an estate owner or by a person entitled at the date of the contract to have a legal estate conveyed to him to convey or create a legal estate . . .”

Mr. Racey certainly contracted to convey or create a legal estate, viz., a term of 10 years. Was he then “an estate owner” within this provision? He was a tenant from year to year, and an estate owner, as defined by reference to the provisions of the Law of Property Act, 1925, includes in that designation a tenant from year to year. Therefore, if s. 10 (1), Class C (iv), is read literally, he is an estate owner within it, and the agreement is an estate contract and is capable of being registered. Should any limitation be engrafted on the literal meaning of the terms of s. 10 (1), Class C (iv)? One limitation, I apprehend, must be read in. The estate owner must have an estate of some sort in the same land in respect of which he contracts to convey or creates an estate in favour of someone else. Hence, an owner of an estate in Whiteacre who contracts to convey or creates an estate in Blackacre would presumably not be an estate owner within the provision. But it is argued by counsel for the defendant that a further limitation should be implied, viz., that an owner of an estate in Whiteacre, contracting to convey an estate also in Whiteacre which is larger than that which he himself possesses, is also not an estate owner. I do not see the necessity for this implication. There is no absurdity in a contract by X, the owner of

(say) a 5 years' term, contracting to convey a 10 years' term to Y, provided that the obligation does not fall to be performed until X acquires the fee simple or some other estate large enough for 10 years to be carved out of it. I do not see why a person who owns an estate, viz., a term from year to year, should be any the less an estate owner because he enters into such a contract. For these reasons, I agree with my Lord that the contract of Apr. 13, 1944, was capable of registration, and, I think, capable of registration ab initio, and, therefore, the appeal fails.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree that the appeal should be dismissed, and I also agree that this was not a case for procedure under R.S.C., Ord. 14, nor a case proper to be put into the Short Cause List. It seems to me that time would have been saved had there been pleadings in the ordinary way.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Metcalf, Copeman & Pettefar (for the defendant); Merrimans, agents for Fraser, Woodgate & Beall, Wisbech (for the plaintiff).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

ARTILLERY MANSIONS, LTD. v. MACARTNEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), October 20, 21, 22, 1948.]

Rent Restriction—Possession—Lease of flat with “attendance”—Separate charge stipulated for attendance—Whether charge for attendance “substantial part of whole rent”—“Value to the tenant”—“Tenant”—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (2)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (c. 32), s. 10 (1).

By an agreement, dated June 16, 1944, the landlords let a flat to A. for one year from June 24, 1944, and thereafter on a quarterly tenancy, at a clear yearly rent of £170. By cl. 3 of the agreement the tenant agreed “to pay to the company by way of further or additional rent £15 per annum for service charges all such charges to be paid on the said days for payment of rent. The service to be provided . . . shall include keeping the rooms and furniture clean sweeping chimneys cleaning windows lighting fires valeting and general attendance but shall not include the cooking or service of meals where the tenant provides his or her own food.” The landlords also agreed to keep the stairway clean and provide a hall porter. On Oct. 22, 1944, A. assigned the benefit of the tenancy agreement to M. The landlords sought possession from M., claiming that, by reason of the provision of services, the Rent Restrictions Acts did not apply. It was common ground that, if the proportion of the rent fairly attributable to the attendance was only £15, that would not be a substantial proportion of the total rent of £185. The landlords contended, however, that £15 did not represent a proportion fairly attributable to the attendance having regard to their value to M.

HELD : the word “tenant” in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 10, referred to the original tenant A., and, in arriving at the proportion of the rent fairly attributable to attendance, regard must be had to the requirements only of A. and not to those of M. or of a hypothetical “average” or “normal” tenant of the class of property in question. In the circumstances, and particularly in view of A.’s requirements, £15 was a bona fide estimate made by the parties to the agreement of the proportion of the rent attributable to attendance, and there was no reason why the court should otherwise construe it. The amount of rent fairly attributable to the attendance was, therefore, not a substantial portion of the whole rent, and the Rent Restrictions Acts applied.

Dicta of VISCOUNT SIMON ([1948] 1 All E.R. 1, 9; [1948] A.C. 291, 314), and MORTON, L.J., ([1946] 2 All E.R. 287, 290; [1946] K.B. 631, 638; 175 L.T. 204, 207) in Palser v. Grinling, applied.

Decision of DENNING, J., ([1947] 1 All E.R. 686; [1947] K.B. 594), affirmed.

[AS TO DWELLING-HOUSES LET AT A RENT INCLUDING ATTENDANCE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, p. 314, para. 370; and FOR CASES, see A DIGEST, Vol. 31, pp. 559, 560, Nos. 7068-7077.]

Cases referred to:

(1) Palser v. Grinling. Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Mischeff, [1948] 1 All E.R. 1; [1948] A.C. 291; [1948] L.J.R. 600; affg., [1946] 2 All E.R. 287, 294; [1946] K.B. 631, 645; [1947] L.J.R. 97; 115 L.J.K.B. 484; 175 L.T. 204, 192; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Engvall v. Ideal Flats, Ltd., [1945] 1 All E.R. 230; [1945] K.B. 205; 114 L.J.K.B. 249; 172 L.T. 134; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the landlords from a judgment of DENNING, J., without a jury, dated Mar. 26, 1947, ([1947] 1 All E.R. 686), refusing an order for possession. The Court of Appeal now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Diplock, K.C., and Quintin Hogg for the landlords.

Collard for the tenant.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a decision of DENNING, J., whereby he gave judgment for the tenant in an action in which the landlords, Artillery Mansions, Ltd., were claiming possession of a flat. Mrs. Macartney, the tenant, was the assignee of the original tenant, Mr. Anderson. Mrs. Macartney's tenancy had been duly determined, and she claimed the protection of the Rent Restrictions Act. The sole question was whether or not this flat was protected having regard to the provisions of the Acts with regard to apportioning the rent of premises where attendance is provided by the landlord.

The sections in question are these. The Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (1) (f), which provides:

"The expressions 'landlord,' 'tenant,' 'mortgagee,' and 'mortgagor' include any person from time to time deriving title under the original landlord, tenant, mortgagee, or mortgagor."

Section 12 (2) of the same Act, which provides:

"This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling, where either the annual amount of the standard rent or the rateable value does not exceed—[certain specified amounts]. Provided that—(i) this Act shall not, save as otherwise expressly provided, apply to a dwelling-house bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of board, attendance, or use of furniture."

And the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, s. 10 (1), which provides:

"For the purposes of proviso (i) to s. 12 (2) of the principal Act (which relates to the exclusion of dwelling-houses from the principal Act in certain circumstances), a dwelling-house shall not be deemed to be bona fide let at a rent which includes payments in respect of attendance or the use of furniture unless the amount of rent which is fairly attributable to the attendance or the use of the furniture, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, forms a substantial portion of the whole rent."

The flat in this case was let by the landlords to Mr. Anderson by an agreement in writing dated June 16, 1944. It was a flat on the fifth floor of the south quadrangle and the term was:

" . . . from June 24, 1944, for one year and thereafter on a quarterly tenancy terminable by either party subject as hereinafter mentioned at the clear yearly rent of £170."

By cl. 3, which is the all-important clause in the present case, the tenant agrees :

A " . . . to pay to the company by way of further or additional rent £15 per annum for service charges all such charges to be paid on the said days for payment of rent. The service to be provided by the company shall include keeping the rooms and furniture clean sweeping chimneys cleaning windows lighting fires valeting and general attendance but shall not include the cooking or service of meals where the tenant provides his or her own food."

B Clause 11 contains a covenant on the part of the tenant :

C " . . . not to assign underlet lend or part with the possession of the said premises or any part thereof without first obtaining the consent in writing of the company for that purpose but such consent shall not be unreasonably withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible intending assignee or under-tenant but provided that the company shall not be required to sanction the assignment or underletting by an under-tenant to any assignee or under-tenant."

Clause 20, one of the landlords' covenants, is :

" . . . to arrange for the staircase to be kept clean and to provide a hall porter to attend to the hall door and to take in messages and parcels."

D It is not necessary to read the rest of that clause. On Oct. 22, 1944, Mr. Anderson assigned the benefit of that tenancy agreement to the present tenant, Mrs. Macartney, by a document of that date, having previously obtained the consent of the landlords.

E The question which arises in the present appeal is whether or not the sum of £15—which by the agreement is to be paid by way of additional rent for the services described in cl. 3—represents the proportion of the total rent fairly attributable to the attendance, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, and whether it is a substantial portion of the whole rent. It is common ground, I think, that, if the proportion fairly attributable to the attendance, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant, is only £15, that would not be a substantial proportion of the total rent of £185. The F tenant contends that this is the sum fairly attributable to the value of the attendance, and she says that, as that is not a substantial proportion of the whole, she is entitled to the protection of the Act. The landlords, on the other hand, say that the sum of £15 arranged between them and Mr. Anderson does not represent a proportion fairly attributable to the value of the attendance, regard being had to the value to Mrs. Macartney, who, they say, is the tenant
G for the purposes of s. 10 of the Act of 1923. They further say that, in any event, £15 does not represent the contractual value of the services which the landlords undertook to provide under cl. 3.

H DENNING, J., decided this case when Palser v. Grinling (1) had not reached the House of Lords, but had been decided by this court. Having referred to the judgment of MORTON, L.J., in that case, DENNING, J., said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 688) :

"In my opinion, they also apply in a case such as the present where there is not an inclusive rent, but the parties have specifically agreed on one figure, £170, for the rent and another figure, £15, for the services. In a case of this kind, however, where the parties themselves have made the severance, I think that in the ordinary way it is reasonable to assume that the amounts allocated are a genuine estimate of the value of the services mentioned. I am supported in this view by the analysis which has been put before me . . . When one has such a difficult matter to assess and estimate, it seems to me that when the parties have in their agreement set down their own figure, it is prima facie to be taken as correct. I see nothing in all these calculations to satisfy me that this £15 is not a perfectly proper figure to put on the value of the services which the landlords contract to provide for that sum."

The first question to be solved is whether or not the "tenant" referred to in s. 10 of the Act of 1923 is Mr. Anderson or Mrs. Macartney. With regard to that, I refer to a passage in LORD SIMON's speech in Palser v. Grinling (1), where he said ([1948] 1 All E.R. 9) :

"Now comes the question how to arrive at 'the amount of rent which is fairly attributable to attendance or the use of furniture, regard being had to the value of the same to the tenant.' It is convenient, first, to observe that the 'amount of rent' is equivalent to 'the portion of the whole rent.' 'Of the same' refers to the attendance or to the use of furniture or to both together when both are provided. A question of some difficulty arises as to the meaning of 'the tenant.' Does the expression refer to the particular individual whose lease is in question, or does it refer to the average or normal tenant of that class of property? I think the phrase refers to the actual tenant whose lease is under examination. It is the analysis of the particular transaction to which he is a party that is the subject-matter of the inquiry. It is the value to him (and included in that value is the fact that he may assign or sub-let) which must be taken into account, but, in taking this view, it is of the utmost importance to observe that the section directs that 'regard shall be had' to the value to the tenant and not that the value to such tenant is to govern the calculation absolutely."

It is clear that Palser v. Grinling (1) did not concern an assignment—the court there was dealing with the original tenant—but, none the less, an argument had been advanced in Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Mischeff (1) (which was decided at the same time) which did involve a consideration of the position if there had been an assignment, and that was dealt with by LORD SIMON (ibid., 5). In that case the original lease was dated 1937, and in 1942 there has been what was held to be a sub-lease which, it had been contended, amounted to an assignment. LORD SIMON said (ibid.) :

"If the respondent was right in this, the year as at which the furniture should be valued would be 1937 and not 1942. But there is no substance in this contention."

He was there, at any rate, indicating the view that the material date was the date of the original lease and not the date at which the assignment had taken place, if there had been an assignment.

In my view, the "tenant" referred to in s. 10 of the Act of 1923 means the original tenant, the tenant who was a party to the formation of the contract made with the landlord, who, of course, often will be the tenant in occupation of the premises at the date of the expiration of the notice to quit and when the case comes before the court. I think that meaning is implicit in LORD SIMON's speech, and I think, furthermore, that it is the natural meaning to be given to the word. The other construction contended for by counsel for the landlords would have the curious result that, although the total rent for premises might remain constant, and although the amount apportioned between the parties and attributed to the attendance might remain constant, none the less the premises would go in and out of the Rent Restrictions Acts according to the requirements or needs of the particular assignee at a particular time. That would, I think, be a very undesirable and confusing consequence, and unless I were driven to that view I should be disposed to decide that the word "tenant" means the original contractual tenant.

A That passage from the speech of LORD SIMON also, in my view, makes it clear that in arriving at the proportion fairly attributable to attendance you have to have regard to the requirements of the particular individual whose lease is in question. That rules out regard being had to the average tenant or the normal tenant in Artillery Mansions or anywhere else. It shows that this matter cannot be decided objectively by assessing the value of the covenant standing by itself and assuming that every tenant will require the landlord to implement it to the full. The needs and requirements of a particular tenant, namely, the original contractual tenant—in this case Mr. Anderson—have to be taken into consideration. That view, I think, is indicated by MORTON, L.J., in his judgment in this court in Palser v. Grinling (1). He says ([1946] 2 All E.R. 290):

B “I think the judge must next consider whether there are any special circumstances providing grounds for attributing to the tenant of the particular flat in question either more or less than his proportion of the cost of providing attendance, arrived at in the above manner. For instance, suppose that part of the attendance provided is the carrying of coals to the flats by a man employed by the landlord; is it right that a portion of the cost of this labour should be attributed to a tenant who chooses to instal electric fires in all his rooms? This is a matter which was much argued before us. My own view is that if the carrying of coals is a service which the landlord undertakes to provide for a tenant, then prima facie that service is of the same value to that tenant as it would be to any other tenant, and the burden is upon the tenant to satisfy the court that less than his arithmetical proportion of the cost should be attributed to him. For instance, the tenant might prove that when the terms of the lease were being arranged, he told the landlord that he did not require this service, and that the landlord could make the appropriate alteration in the lease. If, in these circumstances, the landlord insisted on keeping to his common form of lease, which included this provision, the judge might well think that the amount of rent which was fairly attributable to that particular attendance was little or nothing. In Engvall's case (2) LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1945] 1 All E.R. 234): ‘With regard to No. 19—the provision of personal services of a caretaker for the purpose of carrying up wood, coals and so forth—the fact is that the tenant used electric fires and did not make use of those services, and had no need for them. The judge, accordingly, held (and I think he was fairly entitled to hold) that no value to the tenant must be attributed to that particular undertaking by the landlord.’ I am sure LORD GREENE, M.R., did not intend to lay down any general rule that, if a tenant in fact makes no use of a particular ‘attendance’ which the landlord has contracted to give, no part of the rent must be attributed to that attendance. I think the important point is: What did the parties contemplate at the time when the lease was granted?”

As I read his judgment, that is a clear expression of opinion by MORTON, L.J., that the real crux of the matter is what was contemplated by the parties at the time when the lease was granted. If the House of Lords had thought that was an erroneous view, I think LORD SIMON, in his speech, would have said so in terms. It is argued by counsel for the landlords that when carefully examined the reasoning of LORD SIMON in his speech is inconsistent with that view expressed by MORTON, L.J. I do not think it is.

H The passage which I have quoted from LORD SIMON's speech ([1948] 1 All E.R. 9) must be borne in mind and considered closely in connection with the passage to which I am about to refer, and which is most relied on by the landlords. LORD SIMON said (ibid., 12); were not solely for the tenants' advantage, but he put this on the limited ground that the removal of refuse is also to the advantage of the landlord. A broader view is fully justified, viz., that the greater part of the services of the porter were services rendered to the landlord which did not involve any attendance on the tenants at all. On the other hand, the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, following Engvall v. Ideal Flats, Ltd. (2), held that, inasmuch as the respondent did not require the services of the porter for carrying up coals because she was not using coal fires, the portion of the whole rent which was fairly attributable to the porter's attendance for this purpose would be reduced. This does not seem to be the case, for the tenant who has contracted to pay rent for attendance which the landlord covenants to supply cannot reduce the proportion of the rent fairly attributable to such attendance by saying that though he is entitled to have it he does not want it. The result in Palser's case (1) is that the attendance provided by the appellant and paid for in the total rent was not such as to make the figure which may be fairly attributable to it a substantial portion of the whole rent."

“The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE recognised that the services of the porter

Counsel for the landlords argues that LORD SIMON is there saying, in effect, that all you have to look at is what is the attendance to which the tenant is contractually entitled. He says that that conflicts with MORTON, L.J.'s expression of opinion, and he furthermore says that MORTON, L.J.'s opinion must be considered in relation to the particular circumstances with which he was dealing and that he was only dealing with a case (which he had given as an example) where the tenant had not, in fact, availed himself of the attendance which the landlord had contracted to supply. I think that LORD SIMON is confining himself entirely to the case where the tenant has, in fact, not availed himself of the services, and I think he is accepting MORTON, L.J.'s view with regard to that. MORTON, L.J., had clearly indicated that he did not think that LORD GREENE, M.R., ever intended to suggest that the mere circumstance of non-user would affect the matter. I cannot find anything in that passage, or in the rest of LORD SIMON's speech, to indicate that he is dissenting from the proposition of MORTON, L.J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 291), that the important point is: "What did the parties contemplate at the time when the lease was granted." Incidentally, if that is right, it further strengthens my view that Mr. Anderson and not Mrs. Macartney is the tenant envisaged, because no question arises of anything ever being in the contemplation of Mrs. Macartney. The only parties who could contemplate anything on the subject were the landlords and Mr. Anderson.

If that is the right view, how does the matter stand? The covenant in cl. 3 of the lease is not like a covenant by the landlord to repair. It is not even like a covenant by a landlord to supply certain specified articles of furniture, such as a piano or the articles of furniture which may appear in the schedule to a lease. Covenants of that nature are absolute. The repairs have got to be carried out and the furniture has got to be supplied if it is part of the contract. But this is a provision which entitled the tenant, at his option, to call for certain services to be rendered to him by way of attendance. A substantial proportion of the services envisaged in cl. 3 are by their nature such that they depend on the requirements of a particular tenant at a particular time:

"The service to be provided by the company shall include keeping the rooms and furniture clean, sweeping chimneys, cleaning windows, lighting fires, valeting and general attendance."

If the tenant is not there he may not require his fire to be lighted, or his bed to be made, or any valeting. It depends on the extent to which he occupies the flat and how often he rings the bell, if there is one, to summon an attendant to render him some of these services. I think, in considering a clause of this kind, the parties, when entering into an agreement like this, may very well and very properly take into consideration the probable extent to which the tenant is going to call on the landlord to implement his obligation under such a clause. Similarly, it may become very relevant for the landlord to consider the extent to which he is going to be called on to implement this obligation. In this case there was evidence (and there is no dispute about this) that the sum of £15 arrived at between the landlords and Mr. Anderson was on the basis that Mr. Anderson (who was, I think, a journalist concerned particularly with agricultural matters) was not likely to avail himself to any considerable extent of the services which the landlords undertook by cl. 3 to provide if required, and, therefore, the landlords and Mr. Anderson agreed to allocate to those services, in the particular circumstances of this case, a sum which, according to the evidence of the landlords, was one considerably below the sum which would properly be attributable to services supplied to a tenant who required 100 per cent. performance of the obligations under that covenant. That being so, I find myself in agreement with DENNING, J., in saying that I see no reason to interfere with the bona fide pre-estimate made by the parties to the proportion of the rent fairly attributable to the value to the tenant of this attendance.

I have not lost sight of the fact that LORD SIMON stated that one of the elements to be taken into consideration in apportioning the amount of the rent attributable to the attendance is the fact that he may assign or sub-let. That, in some cases and in the case of a lease of long duration, may be a valuable asset and it may increase the sum attributable to the attendance, but in this particular case the lease was of very short duration. It was only for one year and thereafter at a quarter's notice. I have no doubt that this matter did not enter into the actual calculations of Mr. Anderson or the landlords any more than it had occurred to any of the counsel or judges until Palser v. Grinling (1) reached the House of Lords. In the present case I think, having regard to the short duration of the tenancy and the fact that there was nothing to indicate that Mr. Anderson at that time contemplated that he would be likely to wish to avail himself of the right to assign, that that element is not sufficient to compel us to interfere with the pre-estimate of £15 at which the parties arrived. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I agree. It is true that what has to be valued here is the contractual right to attendance and not the quantum of attendance actually utilised by the tenant, but in valuing the contractual right the Act of 1923, by s. 10, provides that regard must be had to its value to the tenant. The House of Lords, in Palser v. Grinling (1), has held that the "tenant" in this context means, not a hypothetical or average tenant, but, to use the words of LORD SIMON ([1948] 1 All E.R. 10), "the actual tenant whose lease is under examination"—who, for the reasons given by my Lord and which I will not repeat, I agree is Mr. Anderson and not Mrs. Macartney. Such a valuation can only be made by taking into account the special needs and requirements of that individual tenant. Those are the factors which measure the value of the contractual right to the particular tenant as distinct from its market value to persons generally. Notwithstanding the very persuasive argument of counsel for the landlords, I do not think, on reflection, that these conclusions are inconsistent with what is said by LORD SIMON ([1948] 1 All E.R. 12) in Palser v. Grinling (1), or that in that passage LORD SIMON is disapproving of what MORTON, L.J., had said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 290). Where the special needs of the tenant are disclosed before the contract to the landlord, and, therefore, before a value is set in the contract on the contractual right to the satisfaction of those needs, there is a very strong presumption that the contractual value is the true value of the right to the tenant. LORD SIMON, in the passage so often cited during the argument, is simply saying, to my mind, that the value of the contractual right to the tenant crystallises at the time of the contract and cannot be varied afterwards according as the tenant in the event makes use of his contractual rights to an extent greater or less than was originally anticipated. For these reasons, in addition to those given by my Lord, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

SINGLETON, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Wainwright & Pollock, O'Bryen-Taylor & Co. (for the landlords) ;
William Foux & Co. (for the tenant).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re WOHLGEMUTH'S WILL TRUSTS. THE PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. WOHLGEMUTH.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), October 21, 22, 1948.]

Will—Construction—Bequest to "children"—Inclusion of illegitimate children—Effect of surrounding circumstances.

By his will, dated May 13, 1936, a testator left certain property "in trust to pay the income thereof to [my wife] during her life and after her decease in trust for such children or remoter issue of myself and [my wife] in such shares . . . and in such manner as she shall by deed or will appoint."

The testator was first married in 1907, but he separated from his wife in the same year and there were no children of the marriage. Shortly after the marriage he started living with the first defendant by whom he had two children (the second and third defendants) in 1921 and 1929 respectively. The first wife died in 1935 and in 1936 the testator married the first defendant, but the children, having been born during the subsistence of the former marriage, were not thereby legitimated. At the date of the will the testator was incapable of begetting a child and believed that this wife was also unable to bear children.

HELD : since it was impossible to the knowledge of the testator that, in view of his condition, any legitimate children could take under the bequest, the case was brought within the first exception to the general rule stated by LORD CAIRNS in Hill v. Crook, (1873) (L.R. 6 H.L. 265, 282) and applied by SWINFEN EADY, J., in Re Eve ([1909] 1 Ch. 796 ; 100 L.T. 874), and the will must be construed as making provision for the two children of the testator and his wife notwithstanding that they were not legitimate.

Ward v. Van der Loeff, Burnyeat v. Van der Loeff ([1924] A.C. 653 ; 131 L.T. 292), distinguished.

[AS TO ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE OF TESTATOR'S INTENTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 165-183, paras. 217-234 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 614-644, Nos. 4409-4847.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Hill v. Crook, (1873), L.R. 6 H.L. 265 ; 42 L.J.Ch. 702 ; affg. S.C. sub nom. Crook v. Hill, (1871), 6 Ch. App. 311 ; 44 Digest 808, 6614.
- (2) Dorin v. Dorin, (1875), L.R. 7 H.L. 568 ; 45 L.J.Ch. 652 ; 33 L.T. 281 ; 39 J.P. 790 ; 44 Digest 809, 6616.
- (3) Re Eve, Edwards v. Burns, [1909] 1 Ch. 796 ; 78 L.J.Ch. 388 ; 100 L.T. 874 ; 44 Digest 812, 6646.
- (4) Re Pearce, Alliance Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Francis, [1914] 1 Ch. 254 ; 83 L.J.Ch. 266 ; 110 L.T. 168 ; 44 Digest 810, 6627.
- (5) Ward v. Van der Loeff, Burnyeat v. Van der Loeff, [1924] A.C. 653 ; 93 L.J.Ch. 397 ; 131 L.T. 292 ; revsg. S.C. sub nom. Re Burnyeat, Burnyeat v. Ward, [1923] 2 Ch. 52 ; 44 Digest 336, 1662.
- (6) Jee v. Audley, (1787), 1 Cox, Eq. Cas. 324 ; 29 E.R. 1186 ; 37 Digest 57, 15.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a provision made by the testator in his will for the "children" of himself and his second wife operated in favour of two illegitimate children born to him by his second wife during the subsistence of his first marriage. JENKINS, J., held that there was nothing in the will to show that the prima facie meaning of the word "children" could be extended to include illegitimate children, but, in view of the surrounding circumstances, it appeared impossible that there should be any legitimate children of the testator by his second wife, and, therefore, the illegitimate children were entitled to take.

Hubert Rose for the plaintiff, the Public Trustee, an executor of the will.

Wilfrid Hunt for the first defendant (the testator's widow and an executor of the will) and the second and third defendants (the testator's children).

T. A. C. Burgess for parties interested in default of the children.

JENKINS, J. : The question which I have to decide is in substance whether the provision made by the testator in his will for his children by his wife, the first defendant, operates in favour of two illegitimate children he had had by that lady before his marriage to her and during the subsistence of his marriage to a former wife. The testator was married to his first wife some time before 1907. In that year they separated. There were never any children of the marriage. In September, 1913, the testator began to cohabit with the lady who afterwards became his second wife, and is the first defendant in these proceedings. There was a formal deed of separation from his first wife in June, 1921. In October of that year the first defendant, who was formerly Nellie Carey, changed her name by deed poll to her present name of Nellie Wohlgemuth. The first of the two children, that is the defendant, Joan Louise, was born on Dec. 25, 1921, and the second child, the infant defendant, Bryan, was born on Feb. 13, 1929. The first wife died on Dec. 31, 1935, and the testator married the first defendant on Jan. 9, 1936. There was no question of the two children being legitimated by that marriage inasmuch they had been born during the subsistence of the testator's marriage to his first wife.

The testator's will was dated May 13, 1936, and he died on Mar. 2, 1942. By his will, after revoking all former wills, he appointed his wife, Nellie Wohlgemuth, formerly Nellie Carey, and the Public Trustee to be executors and trustees of his will, and he went on : "I appoint the said Nellie Wohlgemuth to be the guardian of my infant children." From there, I can pass to the residuary trust fund. These trusts are declared :

"In trust to pay the income thereof to the said Nellie Wohlgemuth during her life and after her decease In trust for such children or remoter issue of myself and the said Nellie Wohlgemuth in such shares (if more than one) and in such manner as she shall by deed or will appoint but I declare that any such will or appointment shall not be operative until any such child or children attain the age of twenty-eight years and until the attainment of that age any such child or children shall only receive after attaining the age of twenty-one years the income and whilst minors such income shall be applied towards their maintenance and education and in default of any such appointment and so far as any such appointment shall not extend In trust for all the children of myself and my said wife on their attaining the age of twenty-eight years in equal shares and if there shall be only one such child the whole to be in trust for that one child and in the event of any such child or children dying leaving a child or children such last mentioned child or children shall take the share which his/her or their parent would have taken in my residuary trust funds upon their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years and in case there shall be no issue of myself and the said Nellie Wohlgemuth who shall attain the age of twenty-eight years or remoter issue who shall attain the age of twenty-one years In trust as to one-fourth thereof for any child or children of my brother Ludwig Maximilian Wohlgemuth one-fourth to the University College London one-fourth to the London University and the remaining one-fourth to the Berlin University."

The interests under that ultimate trust are represented for the purpose of this application by the University of London. Then there are certain declarations.

"I further declare that in the event of there being no such child or children of my said brother entitled to that one-fourth share the same shall go to the said Berlin University. And I declare that my trustees may with the consent in writing of the said Nellie Wohlgemuth during her life and after her decease at their own discretion raise any part or parts not exceeding together one moiety of the vested or presumptive share of any child or grandchild of mine and the said Nellie Wohlgemuth under this my will and apply the same for his or her advancement preferment or benefit as my trustees shall think fit."

The immediate reason for the summons is a desire to exercise that power in the event of the defendant's children being held contingently entitled under the trusts of residue. Then there is an administrative direction enabling the trustees to postpone sale, conversion and so forth, and all unconverted property is treated as income, and there is an extension of the appointing powers of investment to trustees. This direction follows:

"I direct and desire that my child or children shall be brought up without any religious instruction whatsoever" and, finally, there is a desire that the testator should be cremated. The question I have to decide is whether the trusts for his children by his wife, the first defendant, operate in favour of the defendants, Joan and Bryan, notwithstanding that they were not legitimate children of the testator and his said wife.

The principles to be applied in deciding this question are well settled. They were thus laid down by LORD CAIRNS in particular in Hill v. Crook (1) (1873) (L.R. 6 H.L. 282):

"And what appears to me to be the principle which may fairly be extracted from the cases upon this subject is this—the term 'children' in a will prima facie means legitimate children, and if there is nothing more in the will, the circumstance that the person whose children are referred to has illegitimate children will not entitle those illegitimate children to take. But there are two classes of cases in which that prima facie interpretation is departed from. One class of cases is where it is impossible from the circumstances of the parties that any legitimate children could take under the bequest. A familiar example of that might be given in this way:—Suppose there is a bequest 'to the children of my daughter Jane,' Jane being dead, and having left illegitimate children, but having left no legitimate children. There, inasmuch as the testator must be taken to have known the state of his family, and must be taken to have intended to benefit some children of his daughter Jane, and inasmuch as she had no children who could be benefited except illegitimate children, rather than that the bequest should fail altogether the courts will hold that those illegitimate children are intended, and they will take under the term 'children.' Having referred to that class of cases, I may put them altogether aside; for your Lordships will observe that that class of cases can have no bearing upon the present case, because here, as was truly said, there was no reason why legitimate children might not take under the bequest in this will. The other class of cases is of this kind. Where there is upon the face of the will itself, and upon a just and proper construction and interpretation of the words used in it, an expression of the intention of the testator to use the term 'children' not merely according to its prima facie meaning of legitimate children, but according to a meaning which will apply to, and which will include, illegitimate children. I might give again a familiar illustration of that class of cases by the supposition of a bequest upon which, I presume, there would be no argument. Suppose that a testator were to say in his will 'being aware that my daughter, who is now married to her husband, had before her marriage children by the same person, who in law are illegitimate children, and it being my intention to provide for all the children of my daughter, I give funds to trustees upon trust for her for life, and after her death to divide the funds among the children of my said daughter.' I apprehend that no person reading a bequest of that kind could hesitate to say that the testator had shown upon the face of his will, by the words which he had used, his intention, in a way that could not be mistaken, to use the generic term 'children' so as to include illegitimate children along with legitimate children."

- A That statement of the general law that "children" in a will prima facie means legitimate children, and of the two exceptions from it, has been approved and followed in many other cases. I was referred to Dorin v. Dorin (2) which proceeded upon those same principles. I was also referred to Re Eve, Edwards v. Burns (3), where SWINFEN EADY, J., applying the principle stated by LORD CAIRNS in Hill v. Crook (1), held that a gift to the children of a woman aged 68 at the date of the testator's will, she having illegitimate children but no legitimate children, operated as a gift to the illegitimate children under the first of the exceptions of LORD CAIRNS on the ground that in the surrounding circumstances it was impossible that there should be any legitimate children of the woman in question to take. That decision was referred to with approval by the Court of Appeal in Re Pearce (4). Therefore, I can regard it as settled that the circumstance that a woman to whose children a gift is made and who has had no legitimate children and is past childbearing is a circumstance which can be looked at for the purpose of ascertaining whether the testator by referring to her children in his will meant illegitimate children, and is also a sufficient ground for holding that he did mean illegitimate children. Those are the only authorities bearing directly on the question to which I need refer.
- E I was referred by counsel in his argument on behalf of the University of London as representing the parties interested in default of children of the testator's to take to Ward v. Van der Loeff (5), where extrinsic evidence was held to be inadmissible to exclude the rule against perpetuities. In my judgment, the application of the rule against perpetuities is one to which special considerations apply, and I do not think any assistance for the present purpose is to be derived from Ward v. Van der Loeff (5). The decision in relation to the rule against perpetuities could not have been intended by their Lordships to apply to cases where the meaning of the word "children" is in question, which would, so far as I can see, have been quite inconsistent with the law as laid down in Hill v. Crook (1) and Dorin v. Dorin (2), the correctness of which certainly was not questioned in Ward v. Van der Loeff (5). I think their Lordships regarded those cases as of a different class, and, in my judgment, they are of a different class from cases like Ward v. Van der Loeff (5), and the old case of Jee v. Audley (6) mentioned in it.
- G

H Applying those principles to the present case, first, is there anything on the face of the will which enables me to say, not looking beyond the four corners of the will itself, that the testator when he spoke of his children by his wife, the first defendant, meant illegitimate children—in other words, that he used the word "children" not in its strict prima facie meaning but in the sense of illegitimate children? In my judgment, there is nothing in this will which could lead me to that conclusion. The only passage which at all suggests any such result is the passage where the testator appoints "my said wife to be the guardian of my infant children." That passage was strongly relied on by counsel for the defendants as imparting a reference to existing children. He said if the testator, on the true construction of his will, referred to existing children of his by his wife, then, inasmuch as the only children by his wife existing at the date of the will were the children Joan and Bryan, that in itself would show that by "children" the testator must have meant illegitimate children. I agree that, if one could find here a clear reference to existing children, the consequences suggested by counsel for the defendants could follow, but I can say no more of the appointment of the testator's wife to be "the guardian of my infant children" than that it is, on the whole, perhaps more appropriate to children existing at the date of the will than to possible future children. I cannot say that it is wholly inappropriate to the latter. Looking at the will as a whole, it seems to me that it is as a matter of language perfectly appropriate as a will made wholly in favour of after-born children. I, therefore, hold that the meaning of the word "children" cannot here properly be extended on the strength of any context found in the will itself.

It remains to consider whether, when the surrounding circumstances are looked at, it appears impossible that there should be any legitimate children of the testator by his wife, the first defendant, to take under the will. On that there is evidence which, in my judgment, must clearly be admissible, of the testator's wife and of two doctors who attended the testator. It appears that in or about 1918 the testator's first wife, from whom he was separated, paid him a visit and shot him in the back, the bullet, I understand, lodging in his spine. That injury had the effect of causing a gradual but progressive deterioration of the testator's use of the lower part of his body. The medical evidence clearly establishes the fact that at the date of the will and for some years before that date the testator was incapable of begetting a child and was fully aware of such incapacity. He was at the date of the will aged 67 or thereabouts, but obviously there was nothing in his age itself to make it impossible that he should beget a child. The wife was in her 50th year at the date of the will, and, if that had been the only evidence about her, it might have been that the case could have been regarded as on all fours with Re Eve (3), which proceeded on the ground that the woman whose children were mentioned in the will was past the age of childbearing, but the matter, so far as the wife is concerned, does not rest solely on the question of age, because the wife's evidence was that at the date of the will it would still have been possible for her to have a child. In view of that I am unable to found myself on the age of the wife. I think it is, however, material to add this about the wife's evidence. The wife refers in her evidence to the testator's incapacity and says this was a worry to him and that she, notwithstanding her own view as to her capacity, gave him to understand, and he accepted the position, that after an operation she underwent in or about 1933, she was no longer capable of intercourse with him. So, according to her evidence, they both accepted and were convinced of the fact that it was out of the question that they should have any further children.

On that evidence am I justified in holding that it was impossible at the date of the will that there should be any legitimate children of the testator and the wife, the first defendant, to take under the will? It has been pointed out that there is a distinction between this case and Re Eve (3) in that here the impossibility, if I hold it proved, turns on the incapacity of a man and not, as in Re Eve (3) on the incapacity of a woman. In my judgment, the material fact which has to be proved is the impossibility, and for that purpose I see no distinction in principle between the incapacity of a man and that of a woman. No doubt, the cases in which a man can be proved to be incapable of begetting children must be few in number, and the onus of proof must be heavy. In the majority of cases I should say it would be a matter which was incapable of proof, but in principle I see no reason why the incapacity of a man, if capable of proof, should not be proved and relied on just as much as the incapacity of a woman to establish the impossibility of there being legitimate children to take under a disposition. In the unusual circumstances of this case and on the evidence I find that it is proved that at the date of his will the testator was permanently incapable of having any further children by his wife, and that he was well aware at that date that he was so incapable. One may add also that, rightly or wrongly, he believed that in any case there was no longer any possibility of his wife having a child, irrespective of his own capacity. That being so, in my judgment, the case is brought within the first of the two exceptions to the general rule stated by LORD CAIRNS and applied by SWINFEN EADY, J., in Re Eve (3), and, accordingly, the material parts of this will must be construed as making provision for the two children of the testator and the first defendant notwithstanding that they were not legitimate children.

Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate.

Solicitors: Matthew J. Jarvis (for the plaintiff); Hamkins, Grammer & Hamlin (for first, second and third defendants); Field, Roscoe & Co. (for parties interested in default).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

SELIGMAN v. DOCKER.

C [CHANCERY DIVISION (Romer, J.), July 20, 21, 22, 26, 27, 28, October 22, 1948.]

Game—Reservation by landlord of exclusive right of sporting and preserving game—Abnormal increase in number of pheasants owing to weather conditions—Damage to tenant's crops—Liability of landlord.

The plaintiff was tenant of certain farms of which the defendant was landlord, and by the tenancy agreements the exclusive rights of sporting and preserving game was reserved to the landlord. It was also agreed that the landlord might retain possession of an area of grassland for game rearing purposes at an agreed rental and on payment of compensation for loss of crops and damage and tenant right at valuation in the usual way. In the autumn of 1947 there was an abnormal increase in the number of pheasants in the landlord's coverts, due entirely to exceptional weather conditions and not to an increase in the breeding stock left on the landlord's shoot at the beginning of the season. In the 1947-48 season, over double the number of pheasants were shot as compared with the number shot in the 1946-47 season. In an action brought by the tenant claiming damages for injury done to his crops by the excessive number of pheasants in and after the autumn of 1947, it was alleged that the landlord had permitted or encouraged the birds to collect in unreasonable numbers on his land:—

HELD: (i) since the tenant took his tenancy agreements subject to the reservation by the landlord of the sporting rights and with a full knowledge of the possibility of some damage occurring, he had no right, even though he was not entitled to kill the pheasants himself, to complain at common law because damage was occasioned to him by the pheasants in the landlord's coverts, unless there had been some unreasonable action by the landlord.

Dictum of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Peech v. Best ([1931] 1 K.B. 1, 14; 143 L.T. 266, 269), applied.

(ii) on the facts of the case, the presence in the landlord's coverts or on the tenant's farms of an unprecedentedly large number of pheasants in the autumn of 1947 was not due to any unreasonable conduct or action on the part of the landlord on which an action could be founded.

Farrer v. Nelson (1885) (15 Q.B.D. 258; 52 L.T. 766), distinguished.

(iii) since the birds were ferae naturae, the landlord was under no legal obligation to the tenant to reduce them (observations of ERLE, C.J., in Hilton v. Green (1862) (2 F. & F. 821, 826), and Giles v. Walker (1890) (24 Q.B.D. 656; 62 L.T. 933), applied), and the fact that the tenant had no right to shoot them did not impose any duty in law on the landlord to shoot them himself.

(iv) the only material inquiry was whether the landlord acted reasonably in regard to the tenant, and the question whether he acted reasonably to the public, or to the War Agricultural Executive Committee, did not arise in proceedings brought by a private property owner in respect of his property, but, assuming that the landlord was under a duty to reduce the birds, the duty was to shoot intensively, but in a reasonable way and according to generally accepted methods, and there was no evidence that he had failed to do so.

[AS TO EXERCISE OF SPORTING RIGHTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 20, p. 117, para. 129; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, pp. 358, 359, Nos. 93-98.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Hilton v. Green, (1862), 2 F. & F. 821; 25 Digest 358, 93.
- (2) Farrer v. Nelson, (1885), 15 Q.B.D. 258; 54 L.J.Q.B. 385; 52 L.T. 766; 49 J.P. 725; 25 Digest 359, 98.
- (3) Birkbeck v. Paget, (1862), 31 Beav. 403; 25 Digest 359, 96.
- (4) Giles v. Walker, (1890), 24 Q.B.D. 656; 59 L.J.Q.B. 416; 62 L.T. 933; 54 J.P. 599; 2 Digest 117, 979.
- (5) Stearn v. Prentice Brothers, Ltd., [1919] 1 K.B. 394; 88 L.J.K.B. 422; 120 L.T. 445; 36 Digest 195, 358.
- (6) Boulston's Case, (1597), 5 Co. Rep. 104b; 2 Digest 215, 107.
- (7) Brady v. Warren, [1900] 2 I.R. 632; 2 Digest 206, c.
- (8) R. v. Moore, (1832), 3 B. & Ad. 184; 1 L.J.M.C. 30; 36 Digest 240, 787.
- (9) Bland v. Yates, (1914), 58 Sol. Jo. 612; 36 Digest 174, 199.
- (10) Peech v. Best, [1931] 1 K.B. 1; 99 L.J.K.B. 537; 143 L.T. 266; Digest Supp.
- (11) Sturges v. Bridgman, (1879), 11 Ch.D. 852; 48 L.J.Ch. 785; 41 L.T. 219; 43 J.P. 716; 36 Digest 160, 30.

ACTION for damages and an injunction in respect of injury done to the plaintiff's property by pheasants which the defendant was alleged to have encouraged or permitted to collect in unreasonable numbers on the defendant's land. ROMER, J., held that the defendant had not been guilty of any act on which the plaintiff was entitled to found a claim, either for damages or an injunction, and dismissed the action. The facts appear in the judgment.

Pascoe Hayward, K.C., and G. H. Newsom for the plaintiff.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and J. F. Bowyer for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 22. ROMER, J., read the following judgment. By this action, the plaintiff, a gentleman engaged in farming, sues for damages and an injunction in respect of injury done to his property in and after the autumn of 1947 by pheasants, which, he says, the defendant encouraged or permitted to collect in unreasonable numbers on his, the defendant's, land. The lands which the plaintiff farms are in or near the parish of Crawley, in the county of Southampton. He first came to this neighbourhood in 1933, when he bought a farm called New Barn Farm. He subsequently became tenant of other adjoining farms and in September, 1941, he became tenant from year to year from a Mr. Bassett, the defendant's predecessor in title, of Sandy Down Farm, which is the farm principally in question in these proceedings.

Two tenancy agreements were entered into, both dated Aug. 6, 1942. Under each of such agreements there was excepted and reserved to the landlord all mines, minerals, etc., with liberty for the landlord, his agents and servants and all other authorised persons to enter and be on the premises for the purposes therein specified :

A

B

C

D

E

F

G

H

In a further passage, ERLE, C.J., said (ibid.):

"Then again, you can only in this action find against the defendants for damage done by rabbits turned on to the farm, not as to rabbits turned into Buckney Woods, which was no part of the plaintiff's holding. For if rabbits were put into the wood, and thence strayed into the farm, the defendants would not be liable for the injury they caused. But as regards rabbits turned on to the farm by the direction of the defendants, they would be liable, because the leave to shoot on the farm implied no right to put rabbits into the farm. That hundreds of rabbits were turned on to the farm there can be no doubt. The question is, whether they were so turned on with the sanction and authority of the defendants."

It is to be observed that the defendants' rights over the plaintiff's farm were apparently limited to shooting and did not extend to preserving.

In Farrer v. Nelson (2) the facts were as follows. In 1881 the plaintiff became tenant from one Strickland of a certain farm, but the shooting rights were reserved to the landlord. Strickland subsequently let to the defendants the shooting and sporting rights over his estate, of which the farm leased to the plaintiff formed part. During the spring, summer and autumn of 1884, the defendants, by their gamekeepers, reared in coops elsewhere than on the plaintiff's land but on another part of Strickland's estate about 1,500 pheasants and had carried in the coops about 450 of these pheasants into a coppice wood, which was situate on the plaintiff's farm but was reserved to the landlord in the plaintiff's lease. This coppice wood covered an area of approximately 80 acres, and about an acre of it had been cut down for the purpose of rearing pheasants, into which the 450 pheasants were brought; and the part of the coppice wood so cut down adjoined to within about 5 yards of the fence dividing the coppice wood from a field of the plaintiff, which was about 27 acres in area. The plaintiff sued for damage done by the pheasants to his crops in this field. It was admitted by the defendants that 300 to 400 pheasants had been placed as before mentioned and that some of these pheasants had from time to time come out of the wood and alighted on the plaintiff's farm and, by feeding on his crops, had done damage to the amount claimed in the action. The county court judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the damage so occasioned and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed by him. The defendants appealed to the Divisional Court, and it was argued on their behalf that they had the right of shooting over the land and it was necessary for the reasonable enjoyment of that right that they should be at liberty to stock the land with pheasants. POLLOCK, B., in delivering the leading judgment of the court, observed that the case was new and interesting, but he entertained no doubt that the decision of the county court judge was, in law, correct. He then proceeded as follows (15 Q.B.D. 260):

"I will first deal with the question whether an action can be brought by a neighbour against any person who collects animals upon his land so as to injure the crops of the neighbour, and I should say that beyond doubt such an action would lie, and that the rule upon which it would be founded would be not so much negligence as upon an infraction of the rule, sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas. I agree, however, that this does not solve the question before us. It is not merely the case of a man collecting noxious animals upon his land so as to injure his neighbour, but the case of a man entitled to keep game upon the land, and the tenant complaining of injury to his crops from this game being unduly multiplied. As I understand the law each person in this country is entitled to bring on his land any quantity of game which can reasonably and properly be kept on it, and so that nothing extraordinary and non-natural is done. The case of Birkbeck v. Paget (3), which was cited by the counsel for the defendants to show that there is a difference between introducing fresh game and shifting game from one part of the land to another, is at any rate an authority that the lessee is not warranted in introducing into the land game not bred in the ordinary way. So here, so long as the lessee of the right of shooting was exercising the ordinary rights which the landlord who had reserved the right might have exercised, he was acting within his rights, but the moment he brings on game to an unreasonable amount or causes it to increase to an unreasonable extent, he is doing that which is unlawful, and an action may be maintained by his neighbour for the damage which he has sustained."

A DAY, J., concurred. It appears to me that the essence of that case lies in the fact that the pheasants which caused damage for which the defendants were held liable were not birds which were on the defendants' land in the ordinary course of nature, but birds which had been artificially introduced on to the land by the action of the defendants themselves.

B In Giles v. Walker (4) the defendant, a farmer, occupied land which had originally been forest land, but which had, some years prior to 1883, when the defendant's occupation of it commenced, been brought into cultivation by the then occupier. The forest land prior to cultivation did not bear thistles, but immediately on its being cultivated thistles sprang up all over it. The defendant neglected to mow the thistles periodically so as to prevent them from seeding

C and in 1887 and 1888 there were thousands of thistles on his land in full seed. The consequence was that the thistle seeds were blown by the wind in large quantities on to the adjoining land of the plaintiff, where they took root and did damage. The plaintiff sued the defendant for such damage in the county court and, on the jury finding that the defendant was negligent in not cutting the thistles, judgment was entered for the plaintiff. On appeal to the Divisional

D Court, the plaintiff sought to uphold the judgment by arguing that, if the defendant's predecessor had left the land in its original condition as forest land, the thistles would never have grown; that, by bringing it into cultivation and so disturbing the natural condition of things, he caused the thistles to grow, thereby creating a nuisance on the land just as much as if he had intentionally grown them; and the defendant, by entering into occupation of the land with the nuisance

E on it, was under a duty to prevent damage from thereby accruing to his neighbour. This argument, however, was rejected by the court and the appeal was allowed. LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., said (24 Q.B.D. 657) :

"I never heard of such an action as this. There can be no duty as between adjoining occupiers to cut the thistles, which are the natural growth of the soil."

F LORD ESHER, M.R., was of the same opinion.

In Stearn v. Prentice Brothers, Ltd. (5) the defendants, who were bone manure manufacturers, were sued for damages on the ground that their factory caused rats to collect, which damaged the crops on the plaintiff's adjoining land. The action was dismissed in the county court and the plaintiff appealed. The

G Divisional Court dismissed the appeal on the ground that there was no evidence of anything unusual or excessive done by the defendants, who carried on an ordinary business in an ordinary way. BRAY, J., in the course of his judgment (with which AVORY, J., agreed), referred to certain authorities. He said ([1919] 1 K.B. 396) :

H "The earliest is Boulston's Case (6). It was there held that 'if a man makes coney-boroughs in his own land, which increase in so great number that they destroy his neighbours' land next adjoining, his neighbours cannot have an action on the case against him who makes the said coney-boroughs; for so soon as the coneys come on his neighbours' land he may kill them, for they are ferae naturae, and he who makes the coney-boroughs has no property in them, and he shall not be punished for the damage which the coneys do in which he has no property, and which the other may lawfully kill.' That was an action on the case as here, and seems to be directly in point. I am not aware that this decision has ever been overruled or questioned. It was approved and followed in Brady v. Warren (7). It was cited in Farrer v. Nelson (2), a case relied on by the plaintiff. There, the plaintiff was tenant to the defendant of a farm, the defendant reserving the right to kill game. The defendant had reared large quantities of pheasants and had turned them down in a wood adjoining the plaintiff's land, whence they had strayed on to the plaintiff's land and damaged his crops. This of course was clearly distinguishable from Boulston's Case (6), as the defendant had deprived the plaintiff of his right to kill or destroy the pheasants . . . That case does not, in my opinion, support the plaintiff's proposition. R. v. Moore (8) and the cases which followed it, all cases of nuisance, were cited to us. They lay down that if a person collects together a crowd of people to the annoyance of his neighbours, that is a nuisance. These cases are clearly distinguishable in my opinion. The plaintiff could not kill the crowd or stop them. The crowd are not ferae naturae."

The learned judge then referred to and distinguished Bland v. Yates (9), which was a case where an unusual and excessive collection of manure was held to be an actionable nuisance.

The judgment to which I have just referred clearly points the distinction between cases in which the person injured by ferae naturae has the right to kill them himself and cases in which he has not. In the case before me, the plaintiff had not the right to shoot the pheasants which came on to his land, but it is scarcely true to say, in the language of BRAY, J., that the defendant had deprived him of the right. A man cannot be deprived of a right which he has never had. So far as the plaintiff's farms are concerned, the plaintiff never had the shooting rights over them, for they were reserved out of the grant to him of the farms. It cannot, therefore, strictly be said that he was "deprived" of those rights by the defendant or anyone else. It is, however, true to say that, inasmuch as he was not entitled, and therefore not lawfully able, to kill the pheasants himself, the principle of Boulston's Case (6) does not apply.

In Peech v. Best (10) SCRUTTON, L.J., made the following observations ([1931] 1 K.B. 14) on Farrer v. Nelson (2):

"In Farrer v. Nelson (2) a sporting tenant who brought an unreasonable number of pheasants on the land which injured the crops was held liable in damages. This apparently shows that both landlord and sporting tenant must use their land reasonably having regard to the interest of the other, and will be liable for damage caused to the other by extraordinary, non-natural, or unreasonable action."

On the above cases, counsel for the plaintiff submitted the following propositions. (i) If a man does something on his land which causes wild animals or birds to collect on it, his neighbour generally has no remedy if the animals or birds come out on to his land and do damage; but this is subject to the proviso that the user of the land is a natural user and it is conceded in the argument that the preserving of game for shooting purposes is such a user. (ii) The rule is based on the fact that the person whose land is injured may lawfully kill the wild animals or birds which are doing the injury. (iii) The principle has no application in cases like the present where, under an agreement or grant, the right to shoot game over particular land is vested in some person other than the occupier. In such a case the occupier is "disarmed" by the contract, i.e., he is debarred from shooting the invading animals or birds himself. (iv) Consequently, in such a case the law imposes on the person who enjoys the shooting rights the duty not to bring on to the land in question or adjoining land of his own game to an unreasonable extent and not to cause the game to increase to an unreasonable extent. (v) The question of what is reasonable or unreasonable is a question of law, and the interests of the public and the general economy of the nation are amongst the considerations which are relevant to its decision. (vi) There is some authority (e.g., Hilton v. Green (1)) for the view that a shooting tenant does not cause game to increase merely by omitting to shoot it. It was submitted that this view is wrong, but, even assuming its accuracy, it was contended that, if a man preserves game, he is under an obligation to shoot sufficiently intensively to keep the game down to reasonable numbers. It is, of course, quite clear that, when the plaintiff took his tenancy agreements of Sandy Down Farm in August, 1942, he knew that the coverts on his landlord's estate (some of them lying within his, the plaintiff's farms) were intended to be used for the preserving and shooting of pheasants; and it was, indeed, for the furtherance of that very purpose that the sporting rights were reserved from the grants to the plaintiff. Such a purpose was calculated to injure the plaintiff's crops in some degree, especially as the artificial feeding of pheasants was, when the agreements were entered into, prohibited. As against the possibility of such damage occurring, however, the plaintiff had the advantage of a somewhat reduced rent and the protection afforded by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, s. 11. In the light of these circumstances, it is, in my opinion, clear that the plaintiff, although "disarmed," could have no right to complain at common law merely because some damage (slight but definite) was occasioned to him by the pheasants in the defendant's coverts.

At what point then, or in what circumstances, does such a right arise, assuming that it is capable of arising at all? I think the answer is to be found in the passage already quoted from the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Peech v. Best (10): the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff for damage caused by "extraordinary, non-natural or unreasonable action." SCRUTTON, L.J., in this passage, was expressing his views of the effect of Farrer v. Nelson (2), but he indicated no disapproval of such effect and was, as I think, expressing also his own view of the law. If I may respectfully say so, such view seems quite consistent with the other cases to which I have referred, and I propose to apply it to the circumstances of the present case. It is not suggested that any action by the defendant was "extraordinary" or "non-natural," and the question, therefore, narrows down to this: Was the damage of which the plaintiff complains caused by any unreasonable action by the defendant? I am quite unable, on the evidence, to hold that the presence of what was admittedly a large number of pheasants in the defendant's coverts, or on and around Sandy Down Farm, last autumn was due to any unreasonable action on the part of the defendant. He said in evidence that he had not, at any time since 1944, bought or put down any eggs or young birds or any artificial stock on his shoot, and in this he was confirmed by his head-keeper, Nicholson. I accept this evidence as true. The only thing of this kind at all that happened was when, as occurred occasionally during haymaking, hen birds were killed on their nests and the chicks, which would have otherwise perished, were saved by the defendant's keepers and put under hens. Nicholson said that, in the spring of 1947, some 35 to 40 birds were saved in this way. Apart from this (of which clearly no complaint could be made by the plaintiff), the whole of the pheasants on the defendant's shoot were wild, a fact which, in my judgment, very materially distinguishes this case from Farrer v. Nelson (2).

What, then, was responsible for the presence in the autumn of 1947 of wild pheasants so much in excess of those which had been found in any previous year? I am satisfied that it was not due to an unreasonably large stock having been left after the close of the shooting season 1946-47. As to this, the defendant estimated that the breeding stock after that season was much the same as what had been left at the end of the previous shooting season. Nicholson corroborated this and expressed the view that the stock was about 600 birds in the spring of 1946 and a similar number in the spring of 1947. There was no evidence that the proportion of cocks to hens in the breeding stock was higher in 1946 than it was in 1947. No complaint was made that there were too many pheasants on the defendant's shoot in the autumn of 1946, and I find, accordingly, that the increase which occurred in the following autumn was not due to an increase in the breeding stock left at the beginning of the season and far less was it due to an unreasonable increase in such stock.

The question then arises why the breeding stock in the spring of 1947 resulted in so many more birds reaching maturity than was the case with the approximately equivalent stock the previous year. The evidence which was given on this point leads to one conclusion and one conclusion only, and that is that it was due to the exceptional weather conditions which prevailed in Hampshire, as elsewhere, in the summer of 1947 and particularly during the very important months of May and June. On this question, all the witnesses who gave evidence about it were practically unanimous, including the plaintiff himself, who gave his evidence in every way very fairly indeed. Mr. Bray, the secretary of the Hampshire War Agricultural Executive Committee, who gave evidence before me, said that 1947 was a quite exceptional year all over Hampshire for the number of pheasants and that he had never seen anything like it in his experience and that many people much older than he would have said the same thing. He also said that May and June are the important months for pheasant breeding, and that those months in 1947 were wonderful. Mr. Bray then gave the following evidence :

“(Q.)—Now, anyone who left a stock of birds which would have been a reasonable stock to leave in a normal year would suddenly find in 1947 that they had double the number of birds in their coverts, or very nearly that, which they expected to have ? (A.)—I think that was the experience of a number of estates.

(Q.)—That is, no doubt, what happened in the case of [the defendant] ?

(A.)—That is how it appears to me.”

Then, with regard to the large number of birds on the defendant's estate, he said that he did not suggest that that was due to anything unusual that the defendant did, that the trouble was the concentration of the birds in three or four areas and that the birds could not have been prevented from nesting and hatching in those areas. He then added that he thought that, if the defendant or his keepers had wished to disperse them over a wider area, they could have done so, but that is a point with which I am not for the moment concerned.

The defendant described 1947 as a “double” year, by which he meant that the number of pheasants seemed to him to be about double the normal number found in previous years. Nicholson agreed with him and said that the only other year that he knew in which pheasants did any better was 1921. Mr. Walter Arnold, whose firm has acted as agents for the Heath House Estate since 1941, and who has for many years been actively engaged in the management of large agricultural and sporting estates in Hampshire, said that, from a general climatic and farming point of view, 1947 was a very exceptional year, and he had never, in his experience in Hampshire, seen anything like it for the number of pheasants. He referred to the absence of thunderstorms in the important months of the year when the pheasants were breeding. Mr. Ingram, a chartered surveyor called by the plaintiff, who has considerable personal experience of shooting, agreed that 1947 was a much better year than ordinarily, but not that it was a “double” year. He estimated the increase of pheasants resulting from the climatic conditions of 1947 as not more than 10 to 20 per cent. On this, as on every other question upon which he gave evidence, Mr. Bray impressed me very favourably as a man whose honesty, and desire to assist the court, were beyond doubt. His work gave him ample opportunity for observing the conditions which prevailed in Hampshire, and I accept his views as to the increase in wild pheasants which occurred throughout his area owing to the exceptional weather conditions of 1947 and especially during the breeding months.

As, therefore, I hold, first, that there was not an excessive breeding stock left on the defendant's shoot in the spring of 1947, and, secondly, that the phenomenal number of mature birds which resulted from this stock was due to the wholly exceptional climatic conditions of that year, it would be impossible, in my judgment, if no other point were taken, to find any unreasonable action by the defendant, so far as the number of birds is concerned, on which an action could be founded. It was, however, argued on behalf of the plaintiff that a substantial contributory cause of the increase in mature birds in 1947 lay in the fact that the defendant employed keepers. The argument, as I understand it, was that, assuming that the defendant could not be held liable if he had employed no keepers at all, nevertheless the employment of any whole-time keepers (even one) is sufficient in itself to fix him with liability, for the reason that, but for the keeper or keepers, some of the birds would have fallen victims to stoats and other vermin and the ultimate numbers which damaged the crops in the autumn would thereby have been reduced. I find this a difficult argument

A it, was that, assuming that the defendant could not be held liable if he had employed no keepers at all, nevertheless the employment of any whole-time keepers (even one) is sufficient in itself to fix him with liability, for the reason that, but for the keeper or keepers, some of the birds would have fallen victims to stoats and other vermin and the ultimate numbers which damaged the crops in the autumn would thereby have been reduced. I find this a difficult argument
B to accept. It is impossible to suppose that there is anything unreasonable in the owner of a shooting estate keeping one or more gamekeepers for the purpose of preserving the game, and I should imagine that the plaintiff is the last person who would be likely to express any such view. He did not in fact do so, but thought that the defendant employed too many. Apparently in 1945 there were two keepers and the number increased as the shoot increased
C and as men returned from the services, until in the summer of 1947 there were five keepers, in addition to the head-keeper, one of whom left in September. I have no reason to suppose that these numbers were in any way unreasonable or excessive for a shoot of this size, and it certainly was in no way proved to my satisfaction that this was so. I am, accordingly, unable to accept the argument which was addressed to me on behalf of the plaintiff on this aspect of the matter.

D I would add at this point that Mr. Bray, in his evidence, was emphatic that the trouble was due not so much to the number of the pheasants in the defendant's shoot, but to the fact that they concentrated in three or four particular places. Mr. Ingram also drew attention to these concentrations. It is reasonably plain, in my opinion, that the congregation of the birds in a few favoured localities was due to topographical conditions; and I accept the view which
E Nicholson advanced in his evidence that birds always seem to flock to a sunny part of the beat. He said (and I believe him) that he never did anything to induce them to concentrate in any particular way. It, accordingly, follows that the effective cause of the damage, as the matter presented itself to Mr. Bray, was not one for which the defendant's keepers were responsible. The result of what I have so far said is that, in my judgment, the presence in the F defendant's coverts or the plaintiff's farms in the autumn of 1947 of an unprecedentedly large number of pheasants, and their concentration in particular areas, was not due to any unreasonable conduct or action on the part of the defendant.

The next subject for inquiry is whether the defendant owed a duty to the plaintiff to reduce or disperse the pheasants when it became known that their
G numbers were so considerable and, if so, whether or not he failed in that duty so as to give the plaintiff a legal right of complaint. I approach this inquiry on the hypothesis, as already indicated, that the presence of these pheasants in such large numbers on the defendant's land had not been brought about by any unreasonable conduct or action on his part. In these circumstances, was he under a legal obligation to the plaintiff to reduce them and, if so, how H quickly and to what extent? In the absence of authority, I am not prepared to hold that he was under any such obligation. The birds were ferae naturae and I am unable to see that the fact that the plaintiff had no right to shoot them imposed any duty in law upon the defendant to shoot them himself. It may be that the number of pheasants would have been less in some degree had the defendant employed no keepers and that, by employing them (though lawfully and reasonably), the defendant had to some extent interfered with the ordinary course and processes of nature. The employment of a reasonable number of keepers was not, however, in my judgment, equivalent to the bringing by the defendant of birds on to his land or unreasonably causing them to increase so as to attract the liability and obligations which such action would, on the authorities, have entailed. In my view, the observations of ERLE, C.J., in Hilton v. Green (1) and the decision in the "thistle" case (Giles v. Walker (4)) alike show that the defendant was under no legal liability to destroy the pheasants which were present on his land.

Having regard to this conclusion, it becomes unnecessary for me to deal with the contention of the plaintiff that the defendant did not shoot, in the 1947-48 season, as intensively as he ought to have done, for the contention postulates a duty on the defendant from which I have held that he was free. I will, however, shortly express my views on it. It was argued that any reasonable man would, in the circumstances which prevailed, have conducted frequent and intensive shoots until the number of the birds was reduced to reasonable, but unspecified, proportions. I am quite unable to accept the submission that the public interest is in some way relevant to the question in this action whether the defendant did or did not conform to the standard of the hypothetical reasonable man. In my judgment, the only material inquiry is whether the defendant acted reasonably in relation to the plaintiff; and the question whether he acted reasonably in relation to the public, or to the War Agricultural Executive Committee as representing the public, does not arise in proceedings which have been brought by a private property owner in respect to his property. That the War Agricultural Executive Committee for Hampshire did, in fact, intervene in the matter is admitted, and much reliance was placed by the plaintiff on their intervention. On Nov. 16, 1947, the committee, in pursuance of powers conferred on them by an order made under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, served a notice on the defendant requiring him to reduce the pheasants on his land by Nov. 17 to the satisfaction of the committee. On Dec. 9 they wrote to him saying that they were not satisfied that the above direction had been complied with, insisting on further destruction of the pheasants without delay, requiring him to continue progressively with the destruction of the pheasants forthwith and giving him until Dec. 27 to comply with the direction. A further direction was issued on Jan. 20, 1948, requiring him to reduce the pheasants to the satisfaction of the committee by Jan. 31, and, on Feb. 4, this date was extended to Feb. 14.

This activity on the part of the War Agricultural Executive Committee was, no doubt, due in some measure to the promptings of the plaintiff, but it is clear that the committee were anxious about the position and felt that the defendant was not dealing with it as energetically as he might have done. This, indeed, was the view expressed by Mr. Bray in his evidence. He said:

"We felt that he was not shooting them fast enough . . . I think he did the best he could, but we thought he ought to have been a bit quicker and we still feel that . . . I have found him entirely reasonable, excepting that I do think he could, in the interests of the food crops, have shot the birds rather more vigorously."

When asked whether he gave the defendant any idea as to what the maximum number was to which the birds should be reduced, Mr. Bray very fairly said that he did not and that it was a very difficult thing to do. He said further in evidence that, in his view, it should have been quite possible to shoot 2,000 pheasants during November and December. This answer was of some interest, inasmuch as, of the 2,441 pheasants which were shot during the 1947-48 season, 2,197 had been killed by the end of December and the number shot in November and December was 1,851. For the plaintiff, it was argued that the defendant could and should have shot more, and Mr. Ingram said in evidence that it would have been possible to organise three shoots a week, and he described how he thought it could have been done. The defendant's evidence was that it could not have been done. Nicholson's evidence also was that it could not be done, and he gave his reasons for thinking so. It is not necessary for me to decide which view is right, though I would be slow to reject the evidence of Nicholson on such a point, for he struck me as being a truthful witness and has an unrivalled experience of the defendant's coverts.

A I will assume that, by some means or other—e.g., by shooting the birds on the ground—the defendant could have done more to satisfy the requirements of the War Agricultural Executive Committee. If the defendant was under an absolute duty to the plaintiff to reduce, say, by half, the number of pheasants which were on his land in the autumn of 1947, and to reduce them by all means at his disposal and at once, then it could not be said that the duty was performed. I have already said that, in my view, he was under no legal obligation to the plaintiff to reduce them at all. If, however, I am wrong in this and he was B under a duty to shoot, I can only contemplate that the duty was to shoot intensively, but in a reasonable way, and according to generally accepted methods. I have not been satisfied by the evidence that he failed in the performance of an obligation so defined. Over double the number of pheasants C were shot during the season as compared with birds shot during the season of 1946-47. The defendant in evidence told me that he did not believe they could reasonably have shot many more and any attempt to do so would merely have dispersed the birds without securing any benefit to the plaintiff. In this he was confirmed by Nicholson. Apart from dispersing the birds, there were the difficulties of finding guns and beaters, and also the fall of the leaf was late D that year. I do not propose to go into these matters in detail, as, on my view of the legal position, they do not really arise. I need only repeat that it has not been proved to my satisfaction that the defendant failed to discharge the hypothetical duty which I am now considering.

It follows from what I have said that, in my judgment, the defendant has not been guilty of any act on which the plaintiff is entitled to found a claim, either for damages or for an injunction. Some reliance was placed on the kind of case of which Sturges v. Bridgman (11) is an example, but, as, in my opinion, E no actionable nuisance has been established, the principle of those decisions has no application. I am not without sympathy for the plaintiff, who unquestionably suffered damage last season and underwent serious trouble and inconvenience as well. There was considerable divergence of opinion amongst the witnesses who were called before me as to the quantum of damage that the plaintiff sustained. Some of it may well be recoverable under the application F which the plaintiff has made—and which was suspended by reason of these proceedings—under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. Section 11 of that Act is specifically directed to circumstances such as those of the present case, and presumably reflects the legislature's views as to what compensation is properly payable to persons in the position of the plaintiff. Be that as it may, G I must apply to this case what I conceive to be the law and, so applying it, I have no alternative but to dismiss this action, with the usual consequences.

Action dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Cunliffe & Airy, agents for White, Nash & Brooks, Winchester (for the plaintiff); Preston, Lane-Claypon & O'Kelly, agents for Evershed & Tomkinson, Birmingham (for the defendant).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

SHELLEY v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.
HARCOURT AND OTHERS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Wright, Lord Uthwatt, Lord du Parc, Lord Morton of Henryton), June 22, 23, 24, November 9, 1948.]

Housing—Accommodation of working classes—Recovery of possession—Right of local authority—Exclusion of Rent Restrictions Acts—Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838 (c. 74), s. 1—Housing Act, 1936 (c. 51), ss. 83 (1), 156 (1) (a). A

S. and H. were tenants of dwellings erected by a local authority for the housing of the working class under the provisions of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. The local authority gave notice to quit to S. and H., both of whom were members of the working class, with a view to the housing of other persons of that class. In proceedings by the local authority to recover possession under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838 :— B

HELD : (i) (LORD DU PARC dissentiente) : the power to terminate a tenancy by notice was within " the general management, regulation, and control of houses " expressly vested in the local authority by the Housing Act, 1936, s. 83, and it was, therefore, a power under an " enactment relating to the housing of the working classes " within the meaning of s. 156 (1) (a) of the Act, so as to exclude the operation of the Rent Restrictions Acts where the authority was seeking to recover possession at the termination of a tenancy. C

(ii) section 1 of the Act of 1838 did not bestow on the magistrate a discretion as to the granting of a warrant, based on the personal position of and hardship to the individual tenant, and " reasonable cause " in that section meant some cause which gives a right in law for the tenant to remain, nor was there any power in the magistrate to postpone the execution of the warrant at his pleasure, for the Act in terms stipulates that the warrant shall command the constables to enter not more than 30 days after the issue of the warrant. D

Decisions of the Court of Appeal ([1947] 2 All E.R. 720; 177 L.T. 662), affirmed. E

[AS TO RECOVERY OF POSSESSION OF CONTROLLED HOUSES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 26, pp. 581, 582, para. 1233; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 38, p. 216, No. 505, and Supplement, Vol. 38, Public Health, No. 509 (e).]

APPEALS by the tenants, Shelley and Harcourt and others, from orders of the Court of Appeal ([1947] 2 All E.R. 720), affirming decisions of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division (ibid., 320). F

In Shelley v. London County Council a complaint was preferred before the Tower Bridge magistrate by the landlords, the London County Council, under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, against the tenant, Shelley, for neglecting to deliver up possession of a tenement, notwithstanding the determination of her tenancy by notice to quit and service on her by the council of a notice in writing under s. 1 of their intention to apply for the issue of a warrant to recover possession. The magistrate issued a warrant for possession of the premises, but directed that it should remain in force for 3 months (as provided by s. 5 (4) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920), and should not be executed until the last day of the period, and the magistrate further informed Shelley that she could apply before the expiration of that time for an extension of the period. The council appealed against the direction and the granting of the liberty to apply, and the appeal was allowed by the Divisional Court. G

In Harcourt v. London County Council a similar complaint under s. 1 of the Act of 1838 was preferred by the landlords before the Clerkenwell magistrate. In this case the magistrate issued a warrant for delivery of possession within 30 days, the limit prescribed by s. 1. The tenant appealed to the Divisional H

Court, and the appeal was dismissed. Appeals by the tenants to the Court of Appeal were dismissed.

The House of Lords (LORD DU PARCQ dissenting) now dismissed appeals by the tenants. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD PORTER.

Ackner for the appellants.

H. V. Lloyd-Jones and R. J. Harvey for the respondents.

A

The House took time for consideration.

Nov. 9. LORD PORTER : My Lords, it is not, in my opinion, necessary to set out in detail the exact circumstances in which these appeals are brought. It is enough to state that Mrs. Shelley, the appellant in the first case, occupied a flat, 8, Barnaby Buildings, of which the respondents are landlords. This flat is rated at £11 a year and she pays a rent of 14s. 5d. a week, or £37 9s. 8d., i.e., more than £20, a year. Notice to quit was served on her expiring on Dec. 9, 1946. She failed to go out, and, accordingly, the London County Council took proceedings to obtain possession under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, after taking the necessary preliminary steps. Mrs. Harcourt is the occupier of other premises belonging to the respondents, also of a value exceeding £20 per annum, and, like Mrs. Shelley, was given due notice to quit, and, as she refused to do so, had similar proceedings taken against her by the respondents. Both tenants are members of the working classes, and the tenements occupied by them were erected by the respondents under the provisions of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, for the housing of the working class. Mrs. Harcourt had been guilty of a breach of a condition of her tenancy and refused to abate it, but, save for her contumacy, it was not of serious consequence and no stress was laid on it in argument before your Lordships. In the other case, there was no complaint of any breach of the terms of occupation, and, therefore, in both cases the main question for the decision of your Lordships' House is whether the Rent and Mortgage Restrictions Acts, 1920-39, apply to an action by a local authority to recover possession of a dwelling-house from a tenant who has been provided with accommodation by the local authority under its statutory powers for the housing of the working class in a case where the action of the local authority has been taken with a view to the housing of another member of that class. Two subsidiary questions were also raised, the first being whether the provisions of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, give a right of recovery of possession in such a case, and the second whether, if they do, the justices in an action under s. 1 have a discretion to refuse or to postpone the issue of a warrant for possession. In Mrs. Shelley's case the learned magistrate sitting at Tower Bridge, to whom application had been made, issued a warrant for possession, and directed that it should remain in force, but should not be executed for three months and that the appellant should have liberty to apply before the expiration of that time for a further period of extension. In Mrs. Harcourt's case a similar application was made to the learned magistrate sitting at Clerkenwell who held that he had no discretion either to refuse or to postpone possession, and, accordingly, issued a warrant for possession in 30 days from the date of issue. Each of the learned magistrates stated a Case for the opinion of the High Court and the two matters were considered together both by the Divisional Court and by the Court of Appeal. Both courts agreed with the latter decision, but in the first case remitted the matter to the learned magistrate with an intimation that the warrant could be suspended for not more than 30 days and in the second case affirmed the order of the learned magistrate. From these orders the appellants appeal to your Lordships' House.

My Lords, each of the appellants is, undoubtedly, protected by the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Restrictions Acts unless that protection is taken away by the terms of the Housing Act, 1936. Section 156 (1) of that Act so far as is material is in the following terms :—

"Nothing in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1933, as amended by any subsequent enactment shall be deemed . . . to prevent possession being obtained (a) of any house possession of which is required for the purpose of enabling a local authority to exercise their powers under any enactment relating to the housing of the working classes."

Section 83 (1) of the same Act provides :—

"The general management, regulation, and control of houses provided by a local authority under this Part of this Act shall be vested in and exercised by the authority, and the authority may make such reasonable charges for the tenancy or occupation of the houses as they may determine."

And the Act itself stipulates that certain classes of houses (among which these are included) provided under earlier statutes shall be treated as if they were provided under the statute of 1936. If, then, the general management, regulation and control of houses includes the right to oust the tenant, the local authority, in giving notice to quit, were exercising their powers under an enactment relating to the housing of the working classes, and the protection afforded to tenants of private owners does not apply. For the appellants it was argued that management, regulation and control could be fully exercised even though the tenants had a right to retain their holdings by reason of the provisions of the Rent Acts, and urged that, as the respondents were prepared to accept the position that they were subject to the obligation not to exceed the statutory rent, so they were similarly obliged to retain their tenants as statutory tenants.

My Lords, I do not know whether the concession in question is necessarily made or not, but, whether the Rent Acts apply to the extent of fixing a statutory rent or not, "management" must, in my view, include a right to terminate the tenancy so far as the general law allows, i.e., after due notice. It is, to my mind, one of the important duties of management that the local body should be able to pick and choose their tenants at their will. It is true that an ordinary private landlord cannot do so, but local authorities who have wider duties laid on them may well be expected to exercise their powers with discretion, and, in any case, the wording of the Act seems to me to necessitate such a construction.

As to the other two points :—

(1) Under the Act of 1838, the jurisdiction of the magistrate was limited to premises of an annual value of less than £20, but this limitation of jurisdiction has been expressly widened by s. 156 (2) of the Housing Act, 1936, which ordains that :

"Where a local authority, for the purpose of exercising their powers under any enactment relating to the housing of the working classes, require possession of any building or any part of a building of which they are the owners, then, whatever may be the value or rent of the building or part of a building, they may obtain possession thereof under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, as in the cases therein provided for, at any time after the tenancy of the occupier has expired, or has been determined."

It follows that the jurisdiction given by the Act is not now limited to houses not exceeding £20 in annual value.

(2) As to the jurisdiction of the justices to refuse a warrant for possession or postpone its execution the matter stands thus. The Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, provided that after due notice, if the tenant or occupier should not appear at the time and place appointed and show to the satisfaction of the justices reasonable cause why possession should not be given, it should be lawful for the justices to issue a warrant to the appropriate constables commanding them within a period to be therein named not less than 21 nor more than 30 clear days from the date of the warrant to enter into the premises and give possession of the same to the landlord. On this wording it was argued on behalf of the tenants that there was no ground for terminating the tenancy except the desire of the local authority to substitute another tenant of their own choosing, that the hardship caused to the tenants by their eviction constituted reasonable cause for refusing to issue the warrant, and in any case it was lawful for, but not compulsory on, the justices to order the warrant to be executed within 30 days. My Lords, I agree with LORD GODDARD, C.J., in thinking that, on its true construction, the Act does not leave it to the discretion of the magistrate to oust or not to oust according as he or she may consider the personal position of and hardship caused to an individual tenant. Such a construction, to my mind, leaves the landlord's right much too vague. "Reasonable cause" means, I think, some cause which gives a right in law for the tenant to remain. As to the use of the words "it shall be lawful," I cannot accept the view that that expression means that it is left to the magistrate to issue or not to issue the warrant at his discretion or to postpone its execution. Again I agree with the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE that the phrase "it shall be lawful" was inserted because up to the passing of the Act magistrates had no such power, and s. 1 thereupon gave them power and made it lawful for them to act. Furthermore, I see no reason for coming to the conclusion that the justices could postpone the execution of the warrant at their pleasure. The Act in terms stipulates that the warrant shall command the constables to enter not more than 30 days after the issue of the warrant. This wording, in my opinion, limits in plain terms, the length of time afforded to the tenant before the warrant is to be executed and allows no further extension. For these reasons I find myself in agreement with the judgment of the Court of Appeal and would dismiss both appeals to your Lordships' House.

LORD WRIGHT: My Lords, notwithstanding the able argument of counsel for the appellants, which loses no merit by not being successful, I think that the appeal should be dismissed for the reasons contained in the opinions of my noble and learned friends, LORD PORTER, LORD UTHWATT and LORD MORTON, which I have read in print.

LORD UTHWATT (read by LORD PORTER): My Lords, counsel for the appellants, in his able argument, very properly brought under review the course of legislation under the Rent Restrictions Acts and the Housing Acts relating to the position of local authorities as respects houses to which in general the Rent Restrictions Acts apply. I do not propose to refer to that legislation, for a close consideration of it has not revealed to me anything which is germane to the proper construction of head (a) of s. 156 (1) of the Housing Act, 1936. I would only mention that the complete exemption from the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, (see s. 3 (2) (c) of that Act) of dwelling-houses to which s. 128 of the Housing Act, 1936, applies, is irrelevant in construing s. 156 (1) of the Housing Act, 1936. Nor, in my opinion, is any help in construing head (a) of s. 156 (1) derived from the other heads included in that sub-section, for those heads deal with subject-matters entirely different from the subject-matter which is comprehended within the head (a).

The point at issue, therefore, lies within a narrow compass. The respondents contend that, in requiring possession of the houses for the purpose of putting themselves in a position to let the houses to some members of the working classes to be elected by them, they required possession "for the purpose of enabling them to exercise their powers under an enactment relating to the housing of the working classes." The enactment relied on is the Housing Act, 1936, and s. 83 (1) of that Act is rested on as containing the power. Section 83 (1) provides:

"The general management, regulation, and control of houses provided by a local authority under this Part of this Act shall be vested in and exercised by the authority. . ."

The houses in question were, in fact, provided under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, but the effect of the Housing Act, 1936, s. 189 (2), is that the houses so provided fall within the application of the phrase "houses provided by a local authority under this Part of this Act." The appellants contended that, in seeking to secure possession, the respondents were not exercising a power, but were merely taking a step referable to their ownership of the properties, and that s. 83 (1) did not confer a power in the sense in which that word was used in s. 156 ; and that an adequate content could be given to head (a) of s. 156 (1) by reason of its applicability to the case where it was sought to obtain possession of a house which had been compulsorily acquired under the Housing Acts. The last point may, I think, be summarily disposed of. I am content to assume—I do not express an opinion one way or another—that the appellants are right in their submission that, even if the tenancy interest as well as the reversion had been compulsorily acquired under the Housing Act, the Rent Restrictions Acts would, apart from s. 156, preclude the acquiring local authority from recovering possession from the tenant, but the fact that the provision is necessary to meet one set of circumstances is no bar to a construction which admits its application to other cases.

My Lords, the local authority, having acquired the houses for the purposes of housing the working classes, are bound to see that the houses are used for that and for no other purpose. That, I think, remains their statutory duty unless and until the houses are sold under an exercise of statutory powers. The selection of tenants qualified to occupy the houses is unquestionably an act of management and the exercise of a power, but, in light of the limitation as to the area of selection, the exercise of the power cannot be referable merely to the ownership of the local authority. It is also referable to their duty. It may not, indeed, have been necessary by express words to vest management in the local authority, but the Act has in terms stated that the management shall be vested in and exercised by the local authority. Clearer words could not be used to state and give a power, and, in my opinion, a power, related to the duty to select, was thereby given.

Two other points were preferred by the appellants. First, it was said that s. 83 does not appear in the fasciculus of sections in Part V headed "General Powers and Duties of Local Authorities." That is true, but, in my opinion, of no weight. A heading to one group of sections cannot alter the meaning of a section outside the group. Further, the reference in s. 186 (1) is not to powers under the Housing Act, 1936, but to powers under any enactment relating to the housing of the working classes. It cannot be said that this was a reference to a particular group of sections labelled "Powers" contained in the Housing Act, 1936. Secondly, it is said that the result of acceding to the respondents' contention is that the rents chargeable as respects houses not excepted under the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (2) (c), are controlled by the Rent and Mortgage Restrictions Acts while the right to possession is not, and that an anomalous position is created. That is not, I think, in any event an argument of great weight, but it may be pointed out that the legislature, while making provision in the Housing Act, 1936, s. 85 (5), as to the rents chargeable as respects (inter alia) the excepted houses by reference to local conditions, has made no provision as to the rents chargeable as respects houses not excepted. It may be that the view taken was that as regards the houses not excepted the Rent Restrictions Acts did what was necessary. I am, therefore, of the opinion that both houses were houses possession of which was required for the purpose of enabling the respondents to exercise a power under an enactment relating to the housing of the working classes.

The remaining question arises from the fact that pursuant to the Housing Act, 1936, s. 156 (2), the respondents sought an order for the recovery of possession under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838. It was argued by the appellants that the Act of 1838, on its true construction, gave to the court, though satisfied that the applicant before them had duly proved his case, a discretion to refuse to issue a warrant for possession. The appellants' argument was based on the language of s. 1 which so far as relevant provides as follows :

"and if the tenant or occupier shall not thereupon appear... and show to the satisfaction of the justices hereinafter mentioned, reasonable cause why possession should not be given under the provisions of this Act . . . it shall be lawful for the justices . . . to issue a warrant [for possession.]”

A In construing this provision due weight must be given to the phrase “under the provisions of this Act.” In my opinion, the only discretion given by this provision when properly construed is a discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction under the Act when, for good reason, it is satisfied that the case ought not to be heard under the Act at all. In that event, the complainant must resort to the jurisdiction which in 1838 existed, and still exists, in other courts. The clear purpose of this Act in conferring jurisdiction on the justices sitting in petty sessions was to set up a summary procedure available when possession of properties of small value was sought, but complicated questions can as readily arise B in the case of properties of little value as in the case of properties of large value, and justices might well take the view that they were ill-equipped for decision of such questions. That, I think, gives an intelligible reason for the provision. I would only add that an Act creating a new jurisdiction to hear a certain type of case should not lightly be construed as authorising the withholding of a remedy in a case properly brought before it, when in other courts, to which resort might C equally well be had, the remedy would follow as of course. I would dismiss the appeals.

LORD DU PARCQ : My Lords, I regret that I am unable to concur in the decision at which the majority of the Appellate Committee have arrived. In my opinion, these appeals should be allowed.

D The question on which I find myself in disagreement with my noble and learned friends is purely one of construction, and it is desirable to approach it, I think, without any preconceived view as to the policy of the legislature. LORD GREENE, M.R., in his judgment, truly observed that considerations “of that kind”—that is to say, what may be called, I think, political considerations—“do not afford an answer by themselves to the question which we have to determine.” He was, if I may say so respectfully, on less firm ground when E he added that “they merely affect the approach to the problem.” I would agree, of course, that a court is often entitled to reject a possible construction of ambiguous words if it would result in absurdity or manifest injustice, and the learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS was fully entitled to say that the construction which he approved was not unreasonable. This fact by itself does not help us, however, unless the competing construction can be said to be unreasonable. F Now, I am very willing to concede that Parliament may have intended to give great and almost unique powers as landlords to local authorities performing their statutory duties under the Housing Acts, on the ground (I quote the words of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS) that “they may be trusted . . . to exercise their powers in a public-spirited and fair way in the general public interest.” It is, however, I think, no less possible that Parliament may have thought that all G tenants, even those who, being members of what is called the “working class,” are given the privilege of occupying their houses as tenants of a local authority, should have the same security of tenure. The London County Council claims to be entitled to give notice to tenants who enjoy the benefits of a Housing Act without assigning any reason for doing so, and to eject them as of right if they refuse to give up possession of their dwellings. That Parliament should have H intended to arm local authorities with this power is not impossible, but neither is it so manifestly probable that a court, if doubt as to the true construction exists, should favour an interpretation which assumes such an intention. If the question is approached, as I think it ought to be, without any preconception as to the probable intention of the legislature, the weight of the argument seems to me to be in favour of the construction for which the appellants contend.

It is not in doubt that the Acts to which it is convenient, if inaccurate, to refer as the Rent Acts are of general application in the sense that they apply to all houses within the limit specified in them except in so far as the Rent Acts themselves, or other legislation, create exceptions. One relevant exception is contained in s. 3 (2) of the Act of 1939, the effect of which is that the principal Acts apply to some of the houses provided under the Housing Act, 1936, but not to all of them. The houses with which your Lordships are here concerned are not within this exception, and the respondents do not claim to be entitled to increase the rents payable by the tenants beyond the standard rent. I pause to point out that it is common ground that, although (under the Housing Act, 1936, s. 83 (1)), local authorities are empowered to "make such reasonable charges for the tenancy or occupation of the houses as they may determine," they must exercise this power with due regard to the Rent Acts when the houses in question are not excepted from the provisions of those Acts. The crucial question can be shortly stated. "The general management, regulation and control of houses provided under the Housing Acts is vested in" and to be "exercised by" the authority. It is later provided that the Rent Acts are not to apply, so far as the recovery of possession is concerned, where possession "is required for the purpose of enabling a local authority to exercise their powers under any enactment relating to the housing of the working classes." Does it follow that the Rent Acts have no application when the local authority seeks to determine the tenancy of a house provided under the Housing Acts? It is said that the answer to this question must be "Yes" because the local authority cannot be said to be exercising the "power" of "general management, regulation and control" of a house if it is fettered by the Rent Acts so far as concerns recovery of possession. The last qualifying words of the sentence are necessary, because, as appears from what I have said already, Parliament has accepted the view that "general management, regulation, and control," may be exercised by a landlord even though he cannot himself fix the rent which he considers a fair or economic one. My Lords, I think it reasonable to say that, notwithstanding the Rent Acts, the ordinary unprivileged landlord does still exercise the "general management, regulation and control" of the house which he lets. Both Acts of Parliament and the common law restrict in more ways than one a landlord's right to recover possession, but it cannot be said, in my opinion, that no landlord exercises these general "powers," as in deference to the argument I will call them, unless he is liberated from all legal, or, at least, all statutory, control. The learned MASTER OF THE ROLLS said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 724) that the argument which appeals to me would result in this: "that the management of these properties . . . would be shared, in effect, between the county council and the county court judge." Many a landlord may have made a similar comment in a moment of bitterness, but it cannot be said, I think, as a matter of law, or as a guiding rule of construction, that the Rent Acts have taken away from landlords the right, or the power, of general management of their property. If I may take by way of illustration a case familiar to some of your Lordships, I believe that most people would say that the Inns of Court exercise the general management, regulation and control of the whole of their property, even though as to much of it their control is, I believe, subject to the Rent Acts. If the material part of the section, as the respondents construe it, is written out in full it will read: "Nothing in the Rent Acts shall be deemed to prevent possession being obtained of any house possession of which is required for the purpose of enabling a local authority to exercise the power of exercising the general management, etc." of the houses in question. I do not think that the natural meaning of this cumbrous and periphrastic sentence would be such as to arm the county council with the power which it seeks. If I am right in my opinion that a landlord exercises the general management, regulation and control of his property although it is subject to the Rent Acts, it seems to me to follow that a local authority cannot be said to require possession of a house for the purpose of enabling it to exercise its power under the Housing Acts when it already owns the house and has let it in proper performance of its duty under those Acts. It is already exercising the powers of "general management, regulation and control" in respect of that very house. It would have been easy for Parliament to say, if it so intended, that the Rent Acts should not apply in any case where a local authority was seeking to recover possession from a tenant of a house provided and let in pursuance of the Housing Acts. Parliament has not said so in terms, and I am by no means satisfied that Parliament was minded to say so. So far as this consolidating Act is concerned, it is more likely that the legislature intended s. 156 (1) (a) to be read as referring to the parties mentioned in the group of sections beginning with s. 71, to which the attention of the reader would normally be directed. My Lords, it is on these grounds that I am for allowing these appeals, and I am happy to find some support for my view in the doubts which were expressed by the learned judges in the Divisional Court, who might well have come to a different conclusion had they not been bound by authority.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON (read by LORD DU PARCQ): My Lords, each of the appellants occupied a dwelling as tenant of the respondents. Each tenancy has been duly determined by a notice to quit which has expired. Each of the appellants was duly served with a notice of the intention of the respondents to apply to the court for possession under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, s. 1, the provisions whereof were fully complied with by the respondents. If the appellants' main contention, which I am about to mention, is unsound, there can be no doubt that the respondents were and are entitled, in each case, to the issue of a warrant for delivery of possession. In regard to the "subsidiary points" mentioned in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., I need only say that I agree entirely with the views which he has expressed on each of them. I also agree with his conclusion on the appellants' main contention, but, as the point is of general importance, I shall state my opinion briefly in my own words.

The appellants contend that they are protected by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts. The Housing Act, 1936, s. 156 (1), provides:—

"Nothing in the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1933, as amended by any subsequent enactment shall be deemed to . . . prevent possession being obtained—(a) of any house possession of which is required for the purpose of enabling a local authority to exercise their powers under any enactment relating to the housing of the working classes."

I have omitted certain words, relating to obtaining possession of a house with respect to which a demolition order or a clearance order has been made, as these words are wholly irrelevant for the present purpose. Thus, the only question remaining for consideration is: Do the respondents require possession of the dwellings in question to enable them to exercise their powers under any enactment relating to the housing of the working classes? In my opinion, they do. The Housing Act, 1936, is clearly an enactment relating to the housing of the working classes, and the respondents require possession for the purpose of enabling them to exercise the powers conferred by s. 83 (1) of that Act in the following terms:—

"The general management, regulation, and control of houses provided by a local authority under this Part of this Act shall be vested in and exercised by the authority . . ."

I cannot doubt that the power to manage, regulate and control houses is a "power under an enactment" within the meaning of s. 156 (1) (a). The dwellings in question were erected long before 1936, but by reason of the Housing Act, 1936, s. 189 (2), they come within the class of houses mentioned in s. 83 (1). If the respondents get possession of these dwellings they are "enabled" to manage, regulate and control them, and they require possession for this purpose. I do not see how the respondents can "manage, regulate and control" houses unless they are in a position effectively to give notice to one tenant and substitute another tenant. Thus, as it seems to me, the present case comes completely within the words of the Housing Act, 1936, s. 156 (1) (a), and the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts afford no protection to the appellants against an order for possession. In my view, these appeals should be dismissed.

Appeals dismissed. No order as to costs.

Solicitors: Hewitt, Woollacott & Chown, and Geoffrey B. Gush & Co. (for the appellants); J. H. Pawlyn (for the respondents).

[Reported by C. St.J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re LILLY'S WILL TRUSTS. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. JOHNSTONE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), November 5, 1948.]

Will—"Investments"—"Securities for money"—Proceeds of life assurance policies.

By his will, a testator gave certain legacies and continued, in cl. 3: "Subject to the foregoing legacies and duties and to the payment of all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses I give and bequeath all my personal property (other than investments securities for money or leasehold property) including all moneys at my bankers and in Post Office Savings Bank on either drawing or deposit account and all articles of furniture plate plated articles china glass books manuscripts pictures prints statutory musical instruments articles of vertu and all other articles of personal domestic and household use and ornament including wines provisions and consumable stores to my niece Florence Lilly Johnstone absolutely." The testator's personal property included stocks and shares, cash in two banks and two life assurance policies.

HELD: on the true construction of the will, the exception in cl. 3 of "investments" and "securities for money" referred to stock exchange investments and things which were not stocks and shares but were securities, such as debentures, but did not include the proceeds of the life assurance policies, which, therefore, passed under the bequest.

[AS TO PRINCIPLES OF CONSTRUCTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 187-204, paras. 240-257; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 702-709, Nos. 5441-5532.]

Cases referred to:

(1) Re Rayner [1904] 1 Ch. 176; 73 L.J.Ch. 111; 89 L.T. 681; 44 Digest 623, 4535.

(2) Lawrance v. Galsworthy, (1857), 30 L.T.O.S. 112; 35 Digest 598, 3388.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of the testator, the proceeds of two life policies of assurance on the life of the testator passed to the defendant, Florence Lilly Johnstone, under a bequest to her by the testator of all his personal property "other than investments securities for money or leasehold property." HARMAN, J., held that the proceeds did so pass.

R. W. Goff for the plaintiff, the Public Trustee.

Myles for the first defendant, Florence Lilly Johnstone.

J. H. Sparrow for the second defendant, G. C. I. Lilly, a nephew representing nephews and nieces interested in the residue.

HARMAN, J.: The testator, a retired colonel of the Indian Army, made his will in February, 1938, and appointed the Public Trustee as executor and trustee. He gave by cl. 2 pecuniary legacies amounting to some £1,600. Clause 3 proceeded in these words:

"Subject to the foregoing legacies and duties and to the payment of all my just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses I give and bequeath all my personal property (other than investments securities for money or leasehold property) including all moneys at my bankers and in Post Office Savings Bank on either drawing or deposit account and all articles of furniture plate plated articles china glass books manuscripts pictures prints statuary musical instruments articles of vertu and all other articles of personal domestic and household use and ornament including wines provisions and consumable stores to my niece Florence Lilly Johnstone absolutely."

The testator died in 1947, and the net value of his estate was £15,000 or a little more. At the date of his death he had certain personal property, stocks and shares to the value of over £8,000, considerable cash in two banks, and two full life policies of assurance with profits amounting to some £3,487. I have to construe the words of cl. 3. It is a gift of all his personal property, an all-embracing clause, save for the exceptions. We know that he had considerable holdings of stocks and shares which will pass either under the word "investments" or "securities for money." We know also that he had other property amounting, as I am told, in value together to about £3,000, that is, in money at the bank and in his personal chattels.

I think it is to be noted of this clause that, although it starts by saying "all my personal property," it proceeds to enumerate a great number of items beginning with money, whether immediately withdrawable or not, and going on with personal chattels. He meant to be paid out of those items legacies of £1,600, and duties and debts and funeral expenses. It will be seen, therefore, that he intended to provide a fund readily available for payment of those items, which he must have known would come to over £2,000.

What then ought I to conclude in this will that "investments" and "securities for money" mean? Those two phrases may mean almost anything within limits according to the context in which they appear. In JARMAN ON WILLS, 7th ed., vol. 2, p. 1272, there is a paragraph devoted to what "securities for money" will or will not mean, in other words, what they have been construed as meaning or not meaning in various wills. It is said authoritatively that without a context "securities for money" means something secured on property and would not include, for instance, ordinary stock exchange investments, although it would, no doubt, include debentures: see per ROMER, L.J., in Re Rayner (1) ([1904] 1. Ch. 189). In its secondary meaning, however, it may include ordinary stock exchange investments. With regard to "investment," the learned author says (ibid., 1273): "'Investment' is a vague term and no general rule can be laid down as to its meaning."

Counsel for the first defendant has drawn my attention to Lawrance v. Galsworthy (2), in which STUART, V.-C., appears to have held—I say "appears" because the report is very obscure—that in a second mortgage of personal estate, a policy of insurance is a security for money within an exception of securities for money. I dare say it was in the document then before the court, but I do not think that helps me very much in construing this will, and I do not feel I am bound by that case. Counsel rested his claim on the word "investments," saying that anything was an investment which was a mode of laying out money with a view to obtaining a return, and that a man who put out his money to buy himself a policy to return a sum, whether at 65 or at his death, was investing money, and that the proceeds would properly be called an investment. I have no doubt that is so, but I think the problem is: What did this testator mean when he excepted "investments" and "securities for money?" I think he meant stock exchange investments—stocks and shares—and things which were not stocks or shares but were securities, such as debentures. I do not think he intended to include policy moneys in that phrase. It seems to me more probable that he intended those moneys to be used for payment of his debts, legacies, and so forth, which he must have known would arise on his death. I do not think, therefore, that the policy moneys are within the words of the exception, and I so hold.

Declaration accordingly. Costs as between solicitor and client to be paid out of fund bequeathed by cl. 3 of the will.

Solicitor: Burton, Yeates & Hart, agents for Nye & Donne, Brighton (for all parties).
[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re WINGHAM (deceased), ANDREWS AND ANOTHER v. WINGHAM.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill, Cohen and Denning, L.JJ.), October 12, November 3, 1948.]

Will—Soldier's will—Actual military service—Airman training in Canada for operational duties—Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 11—Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918 (c. 58), s. 5 (2). A

The deceased entered the Royal Air Force in February, 1942, and in October, 1942, he was sent to Canada for training in operational duties on service as an airman. On Mar. 1, 1943, he wrote a document which he described as a will, and which he signed but did not have attested. On Aug. 11, 1943, after he had become a pilot instructor, he died from injuries received as the result of an aircraft accident. The question to be determined was whether the deceased was "in actual military service," within the meaning of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 11 (as extended by the Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918 s. 5 (2)), when the document of Mar. 1, 1943, was made, and, therefore, entitled to make a privileged will. B

Held: the words "actual military service," in s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, meant "active military service," and any soldier, sailor or airman was entitled, under the statutes, to make a privileged will if he was actually serving with the armed forces in connection with operations which were, or had been, taking place, or were believed to be imminent; and, therefore, the document of Mar. 1, 1943, was made while the deceased was "in actual military service," within the meaning of s. 11, and was admissible to probate as the deceased's will. C

In the Estate of Gossage, Wood v. Gossage ([1921] P. 194; 124 L.T. 770); and Gattward v. Knee ([1902] P. 99; sub nom. In the Goods of Knee, Gattward v. Knee, 86 L.T. 119), applied. D

Observations of LORD MERRIVALE, P., in Re Booth, Booth v. Booth ([1926] P. 133-135; 135 L.T. 234, 235), approved. E

Observations of SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST in Drummond v. Parish, (1843) (3 Curt., 531; 1 L.T.O.S. 207), criticised.

In the Goods of Hill, (1845) (1 Rob. Eccl. 276); Bowles v. Jackson, (1854) (1 Eccl. & Ad. 294); In the Goods of Gibson ([1941] 2 All E.R. 91; [1941] P. 118, n.); and In the Estate of Anderson ([1943] 2 All E.R. 609; [1944] P. 1; 169 L.T. 345), no longer of authority. F

Decision of PILCHER, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 208), reversed.

[AS TO ACTUAL MILITARY SERVICE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 14, p. 198, paras. 325, 326, and Supplement; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 39, pp. 333-335, Nos. 193-219, and Supplement.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) In the Estate of Gossage, Wood v. Gossage, [1921] P. 194; 90 L.J.P. 201; 124 L.T. 770; 39 Digest 338, 245.
- (2) Gattward v. Knee, [1902] P. 99; 71 L.J.P. 34; sub nom. In the Goods of Knee, Gattward v. Knee, 86 L.T. 119; 39 Digest 334, 197.
- (3) Drummond v. Parish, (1843), 3 Curt. 522; 2 Notes of Cases, 318; 1 L.T.O.S. 207; 39 Digest 333, 195.
- (4) Re Booth, Booth v. Booth, [1926] P. 118; 95 L.J.P. 64; 135 L.T. 229; 39 Digest 334, 208.
- (5) Re Kitchen, Kitchen v. Allman, (1919), 35 T.L.R. 612; 39 Digest 334, 206.
- (6) In the Estate of Spark, [1941] 2 All E.R. 782; [1941] P. 115; 110 L.J.P. 71; 165 L.T. 234; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) In the Estate of Rowson, [1944] 2 All E.R. 36; 171 L.T. 70; 2nd Digest Supp.

- (8) In the Goods of Gibson, [1941] 2 All E.R. 91; [1941] P. 118, n; 110 L.J.P. 73, n; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) In the Goods of Hill, (1845), 1 Rob. Eccl. 276; 4 Notes of Cases, 174; 39 Digest 335, 209.
- (10) Bowles v. Jackson, (1854), 1 Eccl. & Ad. 294; 39 Digest 334, 201.
- (11) In the Estate of Anderson, [1943] 2 All E.R. 609; [1944] P. 1; 113 L.J.P. 25; 169 L.T. 345; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (12) Blyth v. Lord Advocate, [1944] 2 All E.R. 375; [1945] A.C. 32; 113 L.J.P.C. 78; 171 L.T. 319; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of PILCHER, J., dated Jan. 21, 1948, and reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 208, dismissing a motion for a grant of letters of administration with a testamentary document annexed. The document, which did not comply with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 9, had been executed by a member of the Royal Air Force, during the war, while he was training in Canada for operational duties. The plaintiffs were beneficiaries under the document and the defendant was the father of the deceased. PILCHER, J., held that the deceased was not in "actual military service," within s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, when the document was made, and, therefore, was not entitled to make a privileged will. His decision was now reversed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Harvey Moore, K.C., and C. A. Emanuel for the plaintiffs.

The defendant did not appear and was not represented on the appeal.

Curr. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. The following judgments were read.

HARRY BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of PILCHER, J., refusing to grant letters of administration, with a certain document annexed, to the plaintiffs, Gwendolen Andrews and Ronald Burgess. The plaintiffs claimed that the document in question was a privileged will made by Roy Wingham, deceased, within the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837. The material facts are that Roy Wingham entered the Royal Air Force in February, 1942. In October, 1942, he was sent overseas to Canada for training in operational duties on service as an airman. On Mar. 1, 1943, while on this service, Roy Wingham wrote out what he described as a will, whereby he left most of his property to Gwendolen Andrews and the remainder to Ronald Burgess. The deceased signed the will, but did not get it attested. At that time he was stationed at a camp about five miles away from the town of North Battleford, Saskatchewan, where he was undergoing flying training as a pilot at 35 Service Flying Training School. On Aug. 11, 1943, Wingham, who had become a pilot instructor, died in the Royal Air Force Hospital, Moosejaw, Saskatchewan, from injuries received as the result of an aircraft accident.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs contended that the will was a valid will. The Wills Act, 1837, s. 11, is in the following terms:

"Provided always, that any soldier being in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman being at sea, may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the making of this Act."

The words are almost identical with s. 22 of the Statute of Frauds, 1677. The Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918, s. 2, extended s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, to any member of His Majesty's naval or marine forces not only when he is at sea, but also when he is so circumstanced that if he were a soldier he would be in actual military service within the meaning of that section. By s. 5 (2) of the Act of 1918 "soldier" includes a member of the Air Force for the purposes of s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837.

At the hearing before PILCHER, J., Mr. Frank Wingham, the father of the deceased, who had been joined as defendant to the motion, appeared and submitted that the case did not fall within the provisions of s. 11 of the Act of 1837.

Mr. Frank Wingham did not appear to argue the case before us. It was clear from a letter written by him to the plaintiffs' solicitors, which was read to the court, that he had ample notice of the date when the appeal would be heard and that his absence was deliberate. PILCHER, J., dismissed the motion on the ground, to quote his own words ([1948] 1 All E.R. 213):

"... that service personnel in time of war who are in expeditione, or, to use the words of the Wills Act, 1837, 'in actual military service,' are confined at least to those who: (1) are actually engaged on a campaign, (2) are proceeding or are under orders to proceed or to hold themselves in readiness to proceed on a campaign, (3) are situated in what can properly be called a beleaguered fortress or a war base from which active offensive or defensive operations are being conducted."

The learned judge declined to accede to the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs that in 1943 Saskatchewan should be regarded as a theatre of war, and said that the deceased, who was sent under orders to a place far removed from the fighting zones in order that he might pursue his training without hostile interference, was not in actual military service. The crucial matter in the judge's opinion was that (ibid.):

"... by his removal to Canada, the deceased was enabled to pursue his ... training in an area which was not subject to hostile interference or attack."

The question for our decision is whether this interpretation of the words "actual military service" is correct. The meaning of these words have been considered in a number of cases in courts of first instance, not all of them reconcilable with one another. We were only referred to one case, In the Estate of Gossage, Wood v. Gossage (1), in the Court of Appeal, in which the point may be said to have arisen indirectly. In that case the testator was a soldier, and in October, 1915, when he was under orders to proceed with his unit to South Africa, he made a will which strictly complied with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837. On Jan. 9, 1918, while he was in Cape Town, he asked his sister, who was in England and then had possession of the will, to burn it as he, the testator, had, as he said, cancelled it. His sister, accordingly, burnt it. The testator subsequently died in November, 1918, in South Africa, and the question for the decision of the court was whether the destruction of the will by the sister in England was an effective revocation of the will, having regard to s. 20 of the Wills Act, 1837, the material words of which for the purpose of the case were that no will should be revoked except by the burning of it by the testator or by some person in his presence and at his direction, with the intention of revoking it. Unless, therefore, the testator was held to be on actual military service at the time when his sister burnt the will, the burning of it by her would not act as a revocation of it. The Court of Appeal decided that the testator, being a soldier on active service, was able to revoke this will without the formalities prescribed by the Wills Act, 1837. The case is, I think, important because it appears that the court considered that active service and actual military service mean the same thing. Thus, YOUNGER, L.J., said ([1921] P. 202):

"Before the Wills Act the special testamentary privileges in relation to their personal estate which were enjoyed by soldiers and sailors on active service consisted in their being dispensed from these formalities of execution required from all other testators."

In this connection I would point out that the first meaning given to the word "actual" is "active" in the OXFORD ENGLISH, the CENTURY, and WEBSTER'S ENGLISH DICTIONARIES.

The question, therefore, seems to me to be whether Roy Wingham at the time when he made this will was "on active military service." What is the test? I do not think the test is whether the airman was in danger from enemy action at the time when the will is made. The test applied by PILCHER, J., includes soldiers who are under orders to hold themselves in readiness to proceed on a campaign. This was so held by SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in Gattward v. Knee (2). In that case there was no danger to the testator at the time when he made the soldier's will. The facts were that the testator was a private in a British infantry regiment and while stationed in Calcutta he wrote a letter containing testamentary dispositions. The letter was written before the outbreak of the Boer War and in it the testator said :

" . . . we are just off to South Africa again for the Boer War—if war is declared at all."

It was proved at the trial that on Sept. 7, 1899, the deceased's battalion was warned for service and two days later was ordered to mobilise for active service in South Africa, and sailed from India for South Africa on Sept. 18, 1899. The President found that the letter was written between Sept. 8 and 19 at Calcutta, before the ship left. The testator died of enteric fever on Feb. 9, 1900, during the siege of Ladysmith. SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in the course of his judgment, said that mobilisation might be fairly taken as a commencement of that which in Roman law was expressed by the words in expeditione, and continued ([1902] P. 102) :

" . . . it is quite clear that when a force begins in a sense to engage in or to enter upon active service, it would be said to be in expeditione."

If the presence of danger arising from enemy activity is not essential in order that a man may be properly described as being on active military service, what is the test of such service? In my opinion, the tests are (a) Was the testator "on military service"; (b) was such service "active"? In my opinion, the adjective "active" in this connection confines military service to such service as is directly concerned with operations in a war which is or has been in progress or is imminent. If I apply these tests, then, in my opinion, the deceased was so engaged. He had abandoned his civilian status for the status of a man enrolled in the Royal Air Force at a time when this country was at war, and he had done so for the purpose of taking part in the war. He had in pursuance of this purpose left his home and the ordinary facilities for making a will which a man has in civilian life, and had been ordered overseas for the purpose of becoming more skilled in his work as a belligerent airman. While overseas he was at any time liable to be ordered to proceed to some area in order to take part in active warfare. In these circumstances, he was, in my opinion, at the time when he made this will in actual military service, and, therefore, the document should be admitted to probate as a valid will.

ABE. COHEN, L.J. : I agree that this appeal should be allowed. The facts have been stated by my Lord and I need not repeat them. The question whether the document of Mar. 1, 1943, should be admitted to probate as a testamentary document, depends on the meaning to be given to the words "in actual military service" in s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837.

The meaning of these words has been considered in a number of cases many of which were referred to by PILCHER, J., in his careful judgment. Language has been used in some of the cases, in particular by SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST in Drummond v. Parish (3), which, it has been suggested, lays down the proposition that under English law the soldiers' military testamentary privilege is identical with the privilege of the Roman legionary. That view has been shown to be fallacious by LORD MERRIVALE, P., in Re Booth, Booth v. Booth (4) ([1926] P. 133-135). None the less, the authorities do establish that the privilege conferred by s. 11 does not extend to regular soldiers of every description at all times, but only to soldiers who are in expeditione. It is important, however, to observe that the courts have not given a narrow meaning to the words "in expeditione," but have taken a broad view of the circumstances, the existence of which justify treating a soldier as being in expeditione, and have had regard to the conditions of warfare from time to time prevalent. Thus, in Gattward v. Knee (2), to which BUCKNILL, L.J., referred, SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., treated a soldier as being engaged on an expedition where his battalion was under orders to mobilise for active service in South Africa. In Re Kitchen, Kitchen v. Allman (5), a soldier who had been ordered to hold himself in readiness for service overseas, and when on final draft leave, was held to be entitled to make a privileged will. A similar benevolent construction has been applied to cases arising out of the 1939-45 war. Thus in In the Estate of Spark (6), a soldier serving at the date of the will in the army in camp in Great Britain was held to be in actual military service; so, in In the Estate of Rowson (7), was a member of the Women's Auxiliary Air Force. In my opinion, these cases were rightly decided, and I am unable to distinguish them in principle from the case now before us. In the last war, bombs were dropped on Tokyo by American land-based planes and the range of powerful bombers was steadily increasing. Troops were dropped from the air behind the enemy lines and it seems difficult to define any part of the territory of a belligerent as outside the range of an "expedition." PILCHER, J., said that the argument of counsel for the plaintiffs amounted to a contention that in the recent hostilities the whole world should be regarded as a theatre of war. I do not think his argument went quite so far as that. I do not think he was considering the position of a soldier on neutral territory. With that possible limitation, I see no reason to reject the argument, though it is sufficient for the present case to say, as my Lord has said:

"While overseas [the deceased] was at any time liable to be ordered to proceed to some area in order to take part in active warfare. In these circumstances, he was . . . in actual military service . . ."

I cannot part from this case without expressing my doubts whether In the Goods of Gibson (8) was rightly decided. The facts are as follows:

"A testamentary paper not duly executed in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, was put forward as a soldier's will under s. 11 of that Act. The writing was in the form of a holograph will, purporting to leave all that Colonel Gibson possessed to his sister, but it was unsigned. Colonel Gibson was killed when his house was destroyed by an enemy bomb in October, 1940. He was then attached to district command headquarters some miles away, but he lived at home."

HENN COLLINS, J., refused to admit the writing to probate ([1941] 2 All E.R. 92) on the grounds that:

"... a soldier who is carrying out peace-time duties, although he is under military authority, is no more a fighting soldier because he is in the army than an ordinary civilian, who, in the circumstances of the present war, may be said to be in the front rank of the fighting."

Read without regard to the circumstances of the particular case, this ratio decidendi would lead to the conclusion that a surgeon serving in a military hospital or a chaplain serving overseas was not entitled to make a privileged will. If HENN COLLINS, J., meant to go as far as that, his decision is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the cases to which I have referred and must be treated as overruled.

DENNING, L.J.: Before 1677 there were no formalities required in order to make a will. The Statute of Frauds, 1677, imposed them, but SIR LEOLINE JENKINS succeeded in obtaining in the statute a privilege in favour of soldiers and sailors. They were exempted from any formalities. He was an eminent civilian and took the idea from the Roman law. For the first 172 years that this privilege existed, there was no reported case on it. This is, perhaps, not so very remarkable. The jurisdiction was confined to the ecclesiastical courts which were not bound by precedents, and, until the time of LORD STOWELL, their decisions were not reported. Moreover, on this subject they seem to have been content to act on the certificate of the military authorities.

The first case in which the scope of the privilege came under close review was Drummond v. Parish (3). General Drummond made a will in peace-time while serving in Woolwich Barracks, but it was not witnessed. He was held not to be in "actual military service." This is the case which has given rise to all the trouble, for in it SIR HERBERT JENNER FUST fell into an error. He thought (3 Curt. 531) that, because the idea of a soldier's privilege was taken from the Roman law, therefore :

"... in order to ascertain the extent and meaning of the exception, the civil law may fairly be resorted to."

Successive courts of first instance have, consequently, felt themselves bound to ignore the words of the statute and to substitute for them this test : Can the soldier be considered as having been so circumstanced that he would under Roman law have been regarded as in expeditione ? Sitting in this court, I am free to say that that test should no longer be applied. The words of our statutes are plain English : "in actual military service." I find them easier to understand and to apply than the Latin : "in expeditione." If I were to inquire into the Roman law, I could, perhaps, after some research say how Roman law would have dealt with its soldiers on Hadrian's Wall or in the camp at Chester, but I cannot say how it would have dealt with an airman in Saskatchewan who is only a day's flying from the enemy. Nor can anyone else. This supposed throw-back to Roman law has confused this branch of the law too long. It is time to get back to the statute. I find myself in full agreement with what LORD MERRIVALE, P., said ([1926] P. 135) in Re Booth, Booth v. Booth (4) :

"... the proposition that the English law as to the soldier's military testamentary privilege is identical with the privilege of the Roman legionary is an entirely mistaken proposition."

Rid of this Roman test, this court has to decide what is the proper test. It must be both simple and certain—simple, because it is to be understood by all ranks, and, certain, because every soldier must be able to apply it without difficulty in the situation in which he finds himself. It is quite beside the mark to inquire what are the reasons for the privilege. The privilege is one thing. The reasons for it are another. The reasons are, no doubt, that a soldier "in actual military service" is likely to be in danger and to be bereft of legal advice. It would be a great mistake, however, to argue therefrom that a soldier who is not in danger or who has legal advice at his elbow cannot make a soldier's will. That would be to confound the reasons for the rule with the rule itself. The rule is that a soldier "in actual military service" is privileged to make a will without any formalities. The plain meaning of the statutes is that any soldier, sailor or airman is entitled to the privilege if he is actually serving with the armed forces in connection with military operations which are, or have been, taking place, or are believed to be imminent. It does not, of course, include officers on half pay or men on the reserve, or the Territorials, when not called up for service. They are not actually serving. Nor does it include members of the forces serving in this country, or on routine garrison duty overseas, in time of peace, when military operations are not imminent. They are actually serving, but are not in actual "military" service, because no military operations are afoot. It does, however, include all our men serving—or called up for service—in the wars, and women too, for that matter. It includes not only those actively engaged with the enemy, but all who are training to fight them. It also includes those members of the forces who, under stress of war, both work at their jobs and man the defences, such as the Home Guard. It includes not only the fighting men, but also those who serve in the Forces, doctors, nurses, chaplains, Women's Royal Naval Service, Auxiliary Transport Service, and so forth. It includes them all, whether they are in the field or in barracks, in billets or sleeping at home. It includes them although they may be captured by the enemy or interned by neutrals. It includes them, not only in time of war but also when war is imminent. After hostilities are ended, it may still include them, as, e.g., when they garrison the countries which we occupy, or when they are engaged in military operations overseas. In all these cases they are plainly "in actual military service." Doubtful cases may arise in peace-time when a soldier is in, or is about to be sent to, a disturbed area or an isolated post, where he may be involved in military operations. As to these cases, all I can say is that, in case of doubt, the serving soldier should be given the benefit of the privilege.

I do not stop to discuss all the cases in detail. I need only say that In the Goods of Hill (9) and Bowles v. Jackson (10) are inconsistent with many later cases; that In the Goods of Gibson (8), is inconsistent with a later decision of HODSON, J., in In the Estate of Spark (6); and that In the Estate of Anderson (11) must be read in the light of the House of Lords' decision on the Home Guard in Blyth v. Lord Advocate (12). In my opinion, those four cases should no longer be regarded as of authority. Applying the test I have mentioned, this airman was in "actual military service" and, therefore, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Costs of both sides to come out of the estate.

Solicitors: Cliftons (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

DENNIS REED, LTD. v. NICHOLLS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), October 21, 1948.]

Agency—Estate agent—Commission—Introduction of person "able" to purchase property—"Ability" to pay.

By a contract in writing, the owner of certain house property instructed a firm of estate agents "to procure for me a person able, ready and willing to purchase my property . . . at the price of £2,900 O.N.O. [or near offer]," and undertook to pay them commission on the introduction of such a person making a firm offer to purchase at the price required.

HELD: ability to purchase within the meaning of the contract did not depend on whether the purchaser had the money in hand at the time of his introduction to the purchaser, but it was sufficient if the agents proved that, if the vendor had been ready and willing to carry out his contract, the purchaser could have found at the proper time the necessary money to perform his obligation.

Dictum of ATKIN, L.J., in James v. Smith ([1931] 2 K.B. 322; 145 L.T. 459), applied.

[AS TO REMUNERATION OF AGENT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, pp. 257-259, paras. 432, 433; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 1, pp. 512-514, Nos. 1770-1776, and Supplement.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) James v. Smith (1921), [1931] 2 K.B. 317, n.; 100 L.J.K.B. 585, n.; 145 L.T. 457, n.; Digest Supp.
- (2) Chapman v. Winson, (1904), 91 L.T. 17; 1 Digest 514, 1776.

ACTION by the plaintiffs, a firm of estate agents, to recover commission alleged to be due to them from the defendant in respect of the introduction of a prospective purchaser of the defendant's property.

The defendant, the owner of certain freehold premises, entered into a contract with the plaintiffs to the following effect:

"I hereby instruct you, Messrs. Dennis Reed Ltd., to procure for me a person able, ready and willing to purchase my property described above at the price of £2,900 O.N.O. [or near offer] and I undertake to pay you commission at the rate of 5 per cent. of the first £300, and 2½ per cent. of the remainder of the purchase price upon your introducing such a person who makes a firm offer to purchase at the price required by me."

A The plaintiffs introduced a Mr. Minski as a prospective purchaser, and his offer of £2,800 was accepted subject to contract, being a deposit of £20 paid by him. Subsequently, the defendant withdrew from this conditional agreement and disposed of the property to another purchaser for £2,900.

The judge held that the plaintiffs had introduced Minski as a person able and willing to purchase the property, and that, accordingly, they were entitled to their commission.

B Lloyd-Jones for the plaintiffs.

Blain for the defendant.

C LYNSKEY, J.: In this case the plaintiffs, Dennis Reed, Ltd., are claiming from the defendant, Mr. H. F. Nicholls, the sum of £77 10s., being commission which they say is due to them in respect of the introduction of a proposed purchaser of certain premises which belonged to the defendant, situate at 3, Weston Drive, Stanmore, Middlesex. The defendant was the owner of the freehold of those premises, and, as he was anticipating going to Australia, he desired to dispose of them. On July 10, 1948, the defendant rang up the plaintiffs, and, in consequence, Mr. Mills, who was employed as a "negotiator" by the plaintiffs, called on the defendant who confirmed that he desired to place his house for sale with the plaintiffs. Mr. Mills produced a printed form containing the contract to be made between the defendant and the plaintiffs with regard to, first, a description of the premises, and, secondly, the commission to be paid to the plaintiffs for any work that they might do under the terms of the contract, and the particulars of when that remuneration should be earned. The operative part of the document reads:

E "I hereby instruct you, Messrs. Dennis Reed Ltd., to procure for me a person able, ready and willing to purchase my property described above at the price of £2,900 O.N.O. [or near offer] and I undertake to pay you commission at the rate of 5 per cent. of the first £300, and 2½ per cent. of the remainder of the purchase price upon your introducing such a person who makes a firm offer to purchase at the price required by me,"

F and it is signed by the defendant.

[His LORDSHIP reviewed the circumstances in which the plaintiffs introduced a proposed purchaser, Mr. Minski, whose offer was provisionally accepted by the defendant, who subsequently sold the premises to another purchaser, and continued:] In those circumstances I have to decide whether, in view of the terms of the contract made between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the plaintiffs have earned their commission—whether, on the true interpretation of the written contract, it entitles them to their commission. What the plaintiffs have to do under the contract to earn their commission is set out in the three lines which appear above the signature: "I hereby instruct you, Messrs. Dennis Reed, Ltd., to procure for me a person able, ready and willing to purchase my property described above at the price of £2,900, or near offer." Stopping there for a moment, there is an obligation on the plaintiffs to procure a person, and that person must be able, ready and willing to purchase the defendant's property at the price of £2,900, or near offer. The first part of the contract calls on the plaintiffs to procure a person, and the person procured was Mr. Minski. He had to be able and ready and willing to purchase the property. That he was ready and willing is quite clear. He made an offer for the property and he was willing to purchase it, and he was in communication with the defendant on the preliminary arrangements to go into the premises. The only question is whether he was able to purchase the property at the price of £2,900 or near offer. He was not ready and willing to purchase the property at £2,900. He was purchasing it at a near offer and I am satisfied that £2,800 was an offer near to the price required by the defendant.

The question is : Was Mr. Minski able to purchase this property at the near offer of £2,800 ? I take the word "able" to mean what it was described as meaning by ATKIN, L.J., in James v. Smith (1), when he said ([1931] 2 K.B. 322) :

"I think that 'ability' does not depend upon whether the purchaser has the money in hand at the time ; to my mind it is a question of fact. I do not think it depends upon whether he has a binding agreement by which some third person is obliged to provide him with resources to carry out the contract. I think it is sufficient if it is proved by the agent or by the purchaser that the circumstances are such that if the vendor had been ready and willing to carry out his contract, he on his part at the proper time could have found the necessary money to perform his obligation."

In other words, it is a question of fact for me whether Mr. Minski was in a position, if the defendant had carried out his conditional agreement by making it a binding one, to have carried out the terms of the contract. Mr. Minski had been employed at Messrs. Harrods for some 20 years. He was a foreman in the grocery department and was earning £8 a week. In addition, he had a house which, according to Mr. Mills, he valued at about £3,800, and for which, according to Mr. Mills, he already had a prospective purchaser, for the sum, I think, of £3,700. That being the position, I am satisfied that he could have found the money, and that, even if the contract had not gone on, even though he had not sold his own house, he would have had little difficulty in finding the money by way of mortgage or going to his bankers and getting a charge on his house. I am satisfied that Mr. Minski was a purchaser able to implement the purchase of this house for £2,800.

The next fact that one has got to consider is that it has been argued that the "price required by me" in the contract means the "price which has been accepted by me." I am referred again to James v. Smith (1) this time to the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., quoting from LORD COLLINS, M.R. (91 L.T. 19) in Chapman v. Winson (2) ([1931] 2 K.B. 320) :

"The first question in all these commission cases is a very obvious one, but one which is frequently overlooked . . . 'The parties can agree upon any particular event upon which commission is to become payable, and the question in the present case is what is the event upon which the parties have agreed that commission shall be payable ?' It is quite open to the parties to use language that makes it clear that the commission is only payable on the money ultimately received or which might have been received but for the vendor's fault. It is quite possible for the parties to make it clear that the commission is to be payable as soon as a contract for purchase has been made, whatever happens to it and with whomsoever it is made. What the event is which entitles the agent to commission depends on the contract in the particular case."

That statement, with great respect, I adopt entirely, and that is the question I have got to decide here. What is the event on which the commission has to be paid ? It is quite clear, it seems to me, that what the agents have got to do to earn their commission is to find a person able, ready and willing to purchase the property at £2,900, or a near price, and I have found that £2,800 was a near price. Having found such a person, the plaintiffs had to introduce him to the defendant, the vendor, and they did introduce him to the vendor. That person, having been introduced, had to make a firm offer to purchase at the price required.

A firm offer to purchase does not mean to enter into a binding agreement, but it has the meaning it has in ordinary contractual language, an offer capable of acceptance so as to become a contract. There was a firm offer made by Mr. Minski to purchase this property for £2,800 subject to contract. That offer could have been accepted by the defendant if he had desired by simply saying : "Right, I accept it. We will agree the contract at once." I think there was a firm offer here which the defendant purported to accept, but he later changed his mind because he got a better offer. The plaintiffs have earned their commission, they having found a person able, ready and willing to pay and having introduced such a person to the defendant, and that person having made a firm offer to buy at the price required by the defendant.

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Solicitors : Kingsley, Napley & Co. (for the plaintiffs) ; Allen & Son (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Reversed. C.A. [1949] 1 All E.R. 1056.

BALL AND ANOTHER v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

C [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Stable, J.), November 2, 3, 1948.]

Negligence—Landlord—Gratuitous installation of domestic boiler—Boiler in dangerous condition—Tenant's daughter injured by explosion—Liability of landlord.

The landlords of a dwelling-house during the tenancy thereof by B., installed gratuitously in the house a new boiler to replace an old one. During very cold weather, B.'s daughter, C., lit a fire in the boiler, which exploded, causing C. serious injuries. The court found as a fact that the boiler, which lacked a safety valve, was dangerous, and that its condition was known or capable of being known to the landlords.

HELD : the landlords were liable in negligence to C. for installing a boiler which might be a source of danger to persons using it, and the mere fact that the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between the landlords and B. was irrelevant.

[AS TO LIABILITY OF A LANDLORD FOR NEGLIGENCE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 596-600, paras. 846-850 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 35-49, Nos. 206-306.]

Cases referred to :

- F (1) Travers v. Gloucester Corporation, [1946] 2 All E.R. 506 ; [1947] K.B. 71 ; 115 L.J.K.B. 517 ; 175 L.T. 360 ; 110 J.P. 364 ; 2nd Digest Supp. (2) Davis v. Foots, [1939] 4 All E.R. 4 ; [1940] 1 K.B. 116 ; 109 L.J.K.B. 385 ; 2nd Digest Supp. (3) Bottomley v. Bannister, [1932] 1 K.B. 458 ; 101 L.J.K.B. 46 ; 146 L.T. 68 ; Digest Supp.

G ACTION for damages for personal injuries and pecuniary loss arising from negligence.

In or about 1936 a house in Woodberry Grove, London, was let by the defendants' predecessors in title to the first plaintiff and her husband. The husband died, and the first plaintiff became the tenant of the house. In 1938 the defendants acquired the reversion and thereafter the first plaintiff was their tenant. During this tenancy, in or about 1940, the defendants installed a new boiler in the house. Very cold weather was experienced in February, 1947. On Feb. 23 the second plaintiff, who was the first plaintiff's daughter, came down shortly before 10.30 a.m. and lit a fire in the boiler with the object of heating water. After an interval of about half an hour the boiler blew up with a violent explosion and the second plaintiff sustained very serious injuries to her leg. The plaintiffs claimed that the boiler which the defendants installed was dangerous because it had not got a safety valve, and they pleaded that :

"In carrying out the said installation the defendants their servants or agents owed a duty to the first-named plaintiff, the members of her family, and all persons entering and being or likely to enter and be within the said kitchen to carry out the same in a proper and workmanlike manner and so to instal the said boiler that it would be as safe for the said purpose as reasonable skill and care could make it." The defendants denied that the boiler was dangerous, and contended that, even if it were, in as much as the defendants were the landlords and the first plaintiff was the tenant, the defendants owed no duty to the first plaintiff, and a fortiori they owed no higher duty to a stranger who was in the position of the second plaintiff. They also alleged contributory negligence on the part of the second plaintiff in lighting the fire in the circumstances. The court gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

C. A. Morgan Blake for the plaintiffs.

Russell Vick, K.C., and Roderic Bowen for the defendants.

STABLE, J. : [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, and found as a fact that the boiler was dangerous, that its condition was either known or was such as, by the exercise of reasonable skill and care, would have been known to the defendants, that the second plaintiff, in lighting the boiler as she did, had not acted in a way in which a reasonable person would not have acted, and that neither of the plaintiffs had given thought to whether there was a safety valve on the boiler or to whether its absence would be dangerous. HIS LORDSHIP continued :] That brings us to the question of law. It seems to me that on the authorities it is plain beyond argument that, if the tenancy or the occupation of the house had begun after the boiler was there, that is to say, if it had been the then existing boiler that had blown up and not the new one, the claim of the plaintiffs in this action must have failed. Counsel for the defendants has called my attention to a number of authorities which support that view. It is sufficient to refer to two : Travers v. Gloucester Corporation (1), where LEWIS, J., discussed the authorities in great detail, and the decision of the Court of Appeal in Davis v. Foots (2). The plaintiffs' counsel has not relied on the duty owed by the landlord, as such, to the tenant or to other persons who come into the house. He has based the claim on the fact that during the subsistence of this tenancy the defendants put in this boiler, and he says that it is completely irrelevant that the defendants happened to be the landlords of the premises, for it is not that relationship and the obligations that arise out of that relationship that the court has to consider. The plaintiffs say that the duties spring from the relationship which arose when the defendants, with the consent of the plaintiffs, went into the premises and put in this boiler.

In my judgment, in the absence of authority to the contrary, that contention of the plaintiffs is sound. What does it matter whether the landlords put in the boiler or whether some independent contractor did it for the first plaintiff ? The relationship of landlord and tenant has nothing whatever to do with it. It is just as irrelevant as though the contractor who put the boiler in was the occupier's son-in-law, or stood in some other relationship to the occupier. The question is : From what does the duty arise ? In my judgment, the duty arose from the fact that the defendants were the people who undertook to put in a boiler.

It is remarkable how little authority there is. I have been referred to a passage in SALMOND ON TORTS, 10th ed., at p. 503, and to a passage in the judgment of DU PARCQ, L.J., in Davis v. Foots (2). DU PARCQ, L.J., said ([1939] 4 All E.R. 7) :

"I have come to the same conclusion. The case as pleaded is not based on the undertaking or agreement on which the learned judge has founded his decision ; but speaking for myself, if I had thought that the judge's decision could be supported on that ground, I should have felt no difficulty in saying that the pleadings ought to be amended in order to enable us to give effect to the learned judge's decision. I think, however—and I have very little to add to what has been said—that it is impossible on that ground, or on any ground, to support the decision to which the judge came. The facts give rise to some difficulty. Undoubtedly some support is to be found for the learned judge's decision in a statement of his view of the law by SIR JOHN SALMOND in his work on "Torts"; but I cannot find any authority binding on this court to support the judge's view. On the contrary, the authorities seem to me to be against it."

Pausing there, it is to be observed that in Davis v. Foots (2) the misfeasance which was alleged was an act or omission that happened two days before the commencement of the tenancy. DU PARCQ, L.J., later says (ibid.):

"... if somebody chooses to undertake an obligation, even gratuitously, to do a service to another person, and does it negligently, he may well render himself liable. But here—I do not repeat the reasons which have been given—there is no question of doing a service for the plaintiff or her husband at all."

If I may say so with the utmost respect, it is not easy to reconcile those two passages. Certainly in the latter passage, DU PARCQ, L.J., without, perhaps, expressing a view, leaves his mind open to the proposition that once the occupation has begun, if a gratuitous obligation is undertaken by the person who happens to be the landlord, that relationship attracts certain duties. Why the duties should be different as between a landlord who, during the subsistence of a tenancy undertakes to render some service and somebody other than the landlord, I do not know.

On the other side of the picture there are the observations of GREER, L.J., in Bottomley v. Bannister (3). In particular, I refer to the passage ([1932] 1 K.B. 478) where, having dealt with the position vis-a-vis landlord and tenant or anybody who comes into the demised premises where at the commencement of the tenancy the property is defective and dangerous, GREER, L.J., says:

"The result is unsatisfactory, because in the present case, if the landlord instead of doing the work himself before he sold the house, had done it afterwards as a contractor to Mr. Bottomley, he would have been liable if there were sufficient evidence that it was negligence on his part to have installed the Halliday boiler without a flue."

He proceeds to deal with the facts and the evidence in that case. The learned LORD JUSTICE there says that, had the landlord done the work after the commencement of the tenancy as a contractor, he would have been liable if there had been sufficient evidence that there was negligence on his part in installing the boiler without a flue.

In my judgment, that principle applies even though the boiler was put in gratuitously without extra charge, and the duty depends, as I think GREER, L.J., clearly indicates it does, on the law of tort and not of contract. It is a duty that is owed to the persons who, in the ordinary course of human life, would use the things. Accordingly, this action succeeds, and there will be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Solicitors: G. Howard & Co. (for the plaintiffs); J. H. Pawlyn (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

HOPES v. HOPES.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.J.J., and Harman, J.), October 20, 21, November 3, 1948.]

Desertion—Parties living under same roof—Need to prove de facto separation—Parties sharing household.

A
A husband and wife were at all material times living under the same roof until a date within one month before the husband filed a petition for divorce on the grounds of his wife's desertion. He claimed that desertion began more than three years before the presentation of the petition by reason of the wife withdrawing to a separate bedroom, no marital intercourse taking place, the frequent occurrence of quarrels between them, and his wife doing no mending or washing of his clothes and no separate cooking for him. B
On the other hand, he always had his meals, which were cooked by the wife, in the common dining room with the other members of the family, and, when not in his bedroom, he shared the rest of the house with his wife and daughters.

C
HELD: while de facto separation, which with animus deserendi is an essential element of desertion, can exist even while the parties are under the same roof, there can be no such separation until husband and wife cease to share one household and set up two households. On the facts in this case there had been no de facto separation, and there was, therefore, no desertion of the husband by the wife.

Smith v. Smith ([1939] 4 All E.R. 533; [1940] P. 49; 162 L.T. 333), distinguished. D

Wanbon v. Wanbon ([1946] 2 All E.R. 366), criticised.

Thomas v. Thomas ([1948] 2 All E.R. 98; [1948] 2 K.B. 294), discussed.

Evans v. Evans ([1947] 2 All E.R. 656; [1948] 1 K.B. 175), disapproved by DENNING, L.J.

E
[AS TO WHAT CONSTITUTES DESERTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, pp. 835-838, para. 1338; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 307-310, Nos. 2840-2880 and p. 322, Nos. 3000-3013.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Smith v. Smith, [1939] 4 All E.R. 533; [1940] P. 49; 109 L.J.P. 100; 162 L.T. 333; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Pardy v. Pardy, [1939] 3 All E.R. 779; [1939] P. 288; 108 L.J.P. 145; 161 L.T. 210; Digest Supp.
- (3) Jackson v. Jackson, [1924] P. 19; 27 Digest 308, 2852.
- (4) Diver v. Diver (unreported).
- (5) Weatherley v. Weatherley, [1947] 1 All E.R. 563; [1947] A.C. 628; [1947] L.J.R. 869; 176 L.T. 434; 111 J.P. 220; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Wilkes v. Wilkes, [1943] 1 All E.R. 433; [1943] P. 41; 112 L.J.P. 33; 168 L.T. 111; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Angel v. Angel, [1946] 2 All E.R. 635; 176 L.T. 90; 111 J.P. 14; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Shilston v. Shilston, (1945), 174 L.T. 105; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (9) Pulford v. Pulford, [1923] P. 18; 92 L.J.P. 14; 128 L.T. 256; 27 Digest 307, 2846.
- (10) Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, (1869), L.R. 1 P. & D. 694; 38 L.J.P. & M. 14; 19 L.T. 575; subsequent proceedings, (1874), L.R. 3 P. & D. 136; 27 Digest 307, 2845.
- (11) Wanbon v. Wanbon, [1946] 2 All E.R. 366; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (12) Evans v. Evans, [1947] 2 All E.R. 656; [1948] 1 K.B. 175; [1948] L.J.R. 276; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (13) Thomas v. Thomas, [1948] 2 All E.R. 98; [1948] 2 K.B. 294.

H

- (14) Hadley v. Perks, (1866), L.R. 1 Q.B. 444; 7 B. & S. 375; 35 L.J.M.C. 177; 14 L.T. 325; 30 J.P. 485; 33 Digest 315, 322.
(15) Buchler v. Buchler, [1947] 1 All E.R. 319; [1947] P. 25; [1947] L.J.R. 820; 176 L.T. 341; 111 J.P. 179; 2nd Digest Supp.
(16) Littlewood v. Littlewood, [1942] 2 All E.R. 515; [1943] P. 11; 112 L.J.P. 17; 167 L.T. 388; 2nd Digest Supp.

A APPEAL by a wife from a judgment of Mr. COMMISSIONER RICHARDSON, granting the husband a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of the wife's desertion. The husband also alleged cruelty in his petition, but the learned commissioner made no finding on that issue. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the commissioner, and ordered a new trial on the issue of cruelty. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

B Norman Black and Miss A. F. Dixon for the wife.
William Temple for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. The following judgments were read.

C BUCKNILL, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. COMMISSIONER RICHARDSON, granting a decree to Jasper Hopes of dissolution of his marriage to May Hope on the ground of her desertion for 3 years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition, which is dated June 27, 1947. In the petition there is also an allegation of cruelty by the wife which injured the husband's health. The learned commissioner in his judgment decided that the wife had deserted the husband since 1934. Having come to that conclusion he made no finding on the issue whether the wife had been guilty of cruelty.

D The parties were married in 1916. The husband is now 58 and the wife 53 years of age, and there are two daughters of the marriage aged 30 and 22. There has been no marital intercourse since 1934, when the wife started to occupy a separate bedroom. The immediate cause of that was that the husband had to leave for work very early, and objected to his wife coming to bed after he had retired there. After 1934, it does not appear from the evidence that he ever asked his wife for marital relations, or that she ever suggested it. Their friendship gradually ceased. The wife objected to the husband going out at night in connection with some concert party of which he was a member. She abused his friends, and appears to have done nothing for his comfort. The quarrels between them were so frequent that the husband said he often retired to his bedroom for the sake of peace. He alleged that she did no mending or washing of his clothes, and did no separate cooking for him. On the other hand, it appears from the evidence that he always had his meals, which were cooked by the wife, in the common dining room with the other members of the family, and, when not in his bedroom, shared the rest of the house with his wife and his daughters. On Jan. 24, 1947, he had a final round table conference with his wife and daughters, and he then complained of his wife's conduct and said he could not stand it much longer. He eventually left the home on May 17, 1947.

G The learned commissioner, in his judgment, pointed out that to justify a decree on the ground of desertion there must be an intention to end the conjugal society—such a course of conduct that the innocent party is compelled to leave the home. At the end of his judgment he said that he thought he was entitled to hold on the evidence before him that the wife, since 1934, had a deliberate purpose of abandoning the conjugal society. The husband admitted that the wife was a good mother to her children, and there was evidence that she was much crippled by rheumatism. The feud between the parents caused the daughters to some extent to take sides, the younger daughter giving evidence for her father, and the elder daughter giving evidence for her mother. It seems to me that the learned commissioner, in his judgment, did not distinguish between a case of actual desertion and a case of constructive desertion. If the facts justified it, the commissioner might have found that the case came within the principle laid down in Smith v. Smith (1), and that the wife withdrew from cohabitation with the husband in 1934, or, at any rate, within 3 years of the petition. On the other hand, the commissioner might have found that the conduct of the wife compelled the husband to leave the matrimonial home. That, in my view, would be constructive desertion. In that case the desertion would start from the time when the husband left the house, in other words, only a month before he filed his petition. Therefore, on the issue of desertion, it seems to me that the husband cannot succeed unless he shows on the evidence that the wife physically deserted the husband for a period of 3 years before June 27, 1947. In my opinion, the evidence does not establish such desertion.

In Pardy v. Pardy (2), SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., when considering the question whether a separation which began by being consensual could acquire the character of desertion without a previous resumption of cohabitation said ([1939] 3 All E.R. 782):

"The word 'desertion' may describe an act, or it may describe a state. For the act of desertion both the factum of separation and the animus deserendi are required. A de facto separation may take place without there being an animus deserendi, but if that animus supervenes, desertion will begin from that moment unless, of course, there is consent by the other spouse."

This passage makes it clear that in the present case there must be the factum of separation before the wife can be said to desert her husband. The mere fact that the wife behaved in such a way to her husband as to indicate that she wished him to leave the house is not in itself desertion. If it were so a wife might be said to desert her husband although she shared the same bed and board with him, but in every other respect treated him as non-existent. On the question whether there can be desertion while the parties are under the same roof, I think the most helpful case is Smith v. Smith (1). The facts in that case were that the husband and wife were living in a house of which the whole basement was occupied by the husband's mother. After the husband and wife's final quarrel the husband left his wife's bedroom and made his home with his mother in the basement. He slept with his son on the first floor, leaving his wife in possession of the ground floor. He neither expected nor desired any services from his wife, but allowed her £1 a week. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., sums up the position by saying that, although there was no physical separation between the basement and the ground floor, it was impossible in any real sense of the word to describe the husband as living with his wife. He, therefore, found that the husband had deserted the wife. It seems to me that the withdrawal of the husband to a separate part of the house distinguishes Smith v. Smith (1) from the present case, where there was no such withdrawal of the husband. The fact that he retired at times to his bedroom does not in itself make that room a separate part of the house. He and his wife and the daughters comprised one household. They shared the same living room, kitchen, stairs, passages and offices, and to say that in these circumstances the wife deserted the husband while they were so living is, in my opinion, to give the word "desertion" a very artificial meaning. I think the conclusion at which I have come is consistent with the decisions in the following cases.

In Jackson v. Jackson (3), the husband and wife lived in the same house, but the husband refused to sleep with his wife, and on that ground the wife applied to the justices for a separation order on the ground of desertion. The justices made the order, but, on appeal to the Divisional Court, SIR HENRY DUKE, P., said ([1924] P. 23):

"If there is abandonment by one of the spouses of the other, that is desertion. If one of the spouses causes the other to live separate and apart, that is desertion... I am not aware of any case in which it has ever been said that desertion could be found upon notional grounds while the parties were living together. When one of the parties has deserted the other they are living separate and apart."

HILL, J., in the same case said (ibid., 26) :

A "There may be desertion though the husband continues to live under the same roof with the wife, but in such case the facts must be very strong. They must show that the husband really causes the wife to live apart against her will—not only sleep apart, but to live apart."

B HILL, J., also referred to Diver v. Diver (4), decided by himself, which goes the farthest in deciding that ill-treatment of one spouse by the other while living together in the same house may amount to desertion. HILL, J., when referring to his judgment in Diver v. Diver (4) said (ibid., 28) :

C "It appeared that not only was he insisting on sleeping in a separate room, but that he never spoke to the wife, that when the wife spoke to him he never answered her, and when she asked him why he so treated her, he knocked her down. It does not seem to me that in that case it was a very strong inference to draw that he had already begun his desertion two months before he left the house. The decree nisi which was granted in that case may also be supported by the fact that I may have found—I have no recollection whether I did, one way or the other—cruelty on the assault."

I infer from this concluding remark that HILL, J., was a little doubtful whether on reconsideration the facts in Diver's case (4) justified a finding "that the wife lived apart from her husband," and, therefore, deserted him.

D In Weatherley v. Weatherley (5) the simple issue was whether refusal of sexual intercourse could by itself amount to desertion. The House of Lords, affirming the Court of Appeal, held that it was not. In Wilkes v. Wilkes (6) the husband, after saying to his wife : "This is the end," never slept with her again, and refused to share her sitting room or to have meals with her. HODSON, J., held on the facts that the common home had been put an end to by the husband in E March, 1937, and he granted a decree to the wife on the ground of the husband's desertion. In Angel v. Angel (7), LORD MERRIMAN, P., in giving judgment in the Divisional Court on an issue of desertion, referred to Smith v. Smith (1) and Wilkes v. Wilkes (6), and said that these cases were rightly decided as instances of what must necessarily be the rare class of case where it is possible for one spouse or the other to assert desertion in spite of the fact that the spouses are F physically living in the same house. In Shilston v. Shilston (8), the husband and wife lived in the same five-roomed bungalow at all material times. After a violent quarrel the wife moved into a separate bedroom and denied the husband his marital rights. The husband kept his own rations in his own room, and the only meal he had in the bungalow was the breakfast which he cooked himself. At night he simply came home, and went to his bedroom and to bed. The wife G also by letters which she wrote to her husband made it clear that she did not intend to do anything for him or have anything to do with him. On these facts, BARNARD, J., held that the wife had deserted the husband because there was a complete abandonment by her of all her duties as a wife. The learned judge based his judgment partly on the statement by SIR HENRY DUKE in Pulford v. Pulford (9), that "desertion is not the withdrawal from a place, but H from a state of things." These remarks of SIR HENRY DUKE, however, were reconsidered by him in Jackson v. Jackson (3) ([1924] P. 25).

In Pulford v. Pulford (9) the facts were that the parties were married in 1883, and lived together for 10 months, when the wife was removed to an asylum as a person of unsound mind. She was not finally discharged until 1902. In 1892 the husband removed to London and bought a business there, lived under an assumed name, and started an adulterous intercourse with another woman. He knew where his wife was after her discharge and sent her money until 1905.

In 1922, the wife took out a summons against him for neglecting to maintain her. The summons was duly served on the husband, but no order was made at the hearing. A fortnight later a fresh summons was taken out charging him with desertion, and an order was made. On appeal to the Divisional Court, counsel on behalf of the husband argued that after the wife was taken to the asylum there was not any existing state of cohabitation to be determined, and he relied on LORD PENZANCE'S dictum in Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald (10) (L.R. 1 P. & M. 697) that "desertion means abandonment, and implies an active withdrawal from a cohabitation that exists." SIR HENRY DUKE decided that in Pulford's case (9) the husband had deserted his wife during the whole period (presumably from the time when he started his adulterous intercourse) because "there had been a complete renunciation by him of every conjugal duty." SIR HENRY DUKE was reminded of his judgment in Pulford's case (9) when he was considering Jackson v. Jackson (3), and in his judgment he pointed out that in Pulford's case (9) the parties had lived together, but were at last living separate and apart, and that his observations were addressed to that question. In Wanbon v. Wanbon (11) the facts as stated ([1946] 2 All E.R. 366) by PILCHER, J., in his judgment that :

"More than 10 years ago the wife withdrew from the husband's bedroom and has ever since refused to have any marital relations with him. During this time the wife has never addressed a word to her husband except to find some fault with him ; she has refused to cook dinner for him, make his bed, mend his clothes or perform any wifely duty for him whatsoever."

The learned judge on these facts, although the evidence was that the husband and wife had lived, not only under the same roof, but also in the same household, granted the husband a decree on the ground of desertion. I must respectfully say that I find it difficult to reconcile this case with the principle laid down in the cases as to what constitutes desertion.

The cases to which I have referred establish that there may be desertion, although husband and wife are living in the same dwelling, if there is such a forsaking and abandonment by one spouse of the other that the court can say that the spouses were living lives separate and apart from one another. On the other hand, when husband and wife are living together, as they were in the present case, it seems that to grant a decree of divorce on the ground of conduct by the wife which ex hypothesi did not amount to cruelty and which did not amount to a life separate and apart from her husband would be to introduce a new ground for divorce. In my judgment, therefore, the decision of the learned commissioner in the present case cannot stand, and the appeal must be allowed. The issue whether the wife's conduct amounted to cruelty must be decided, and, in my opinion, the proper course to pursue is to order a new trial on that issue of cruelty before another judge.

DENNING, L.J. Since the housing shortage the innocent party in a matrimonial dispute is often forced to remain in the same house as the guilty party, because he or she has nowhere else to go or has not the means to go elsewhere. This has given rise to a number of cases where the innocent party has claimed maintenance or a divorce while they are both living under the same roof. The matrimonial offences of cruelty and adultery can, of course, be committed by the guilty party (and be not condoned by the innocent party) while they are living under the same roof, but, can the matrimonial offence of desertion be committed ? One of the essential elements of desertion is the fact of separation. Can that exist while the parties are living under the same roof ? My answer is "Yes." The husband who shuts himself up in one or two rooms of his house and ceases to have anything to do with his wife is living separately and apart from her as effectively as if they were separated by the outer door of a flat. They may meet on the stairs or in the passageway, but so they might if they each had separate flats in one building. If that separation is brought about by his fault, why is that not desertion? He has forsaken and abandoned his wife as effectively as if he had gone into lodgings. The converse is equally true. If the wife ceases to have anything to do with, or for, the husband, and he is left to look after himself in his own rooms, why is not that desertion? She has forsaken and abandoned him as effectively as if she had gone to live with her relatives. The judges of the Divorce Division have adopted this realistic view with complete unanimity right from the decision of HILL, J., in Diver v. Diver (4) to the decision of the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division in Angel v. Angel (7). I find myself in agreement with all the decisions of the Divorce Division, except, perhaps, Wanbon v. Wanbon (11), where the parties were said to be still in one household. If that means that, although living at arms' length, they were still sharing the same living room, eating at the same table and sitting by the same fire, then I cannot agree with the finding of desertion. It is most important to draw a clear line between desertion, which is a ground for divorce, and gross neglect or chronic discord, which is not. That line is drawn at the point where the parties are living separately and apart. In cases where they are living under the same roof, that point is reached when they cease to be one household and become two households, or, in other words, when they are no longer residing with one another or cohabiting with one another.

There is one case, however, which I cannot fit into a consistent body of law on this subject. It is Evans v. Evans (12). There the husband had bolted the doors of the house against the wife. She re-entered through the windows and afterwards lived in a different part of the house from him. The justices found that he had deserted her, a finding which was fully justified on the principle I have stated, and ordered him to pay maintenance for the wife and children. When the wife sought to enforce the order, the Divisional Court, by a majority, held it was unenforceable because, although the husband had deserted her and was still deserting her, she was still residing with him. That seems to me to be self-contradictory. How can anyone say that, at one and the same time, a wife is residing with her husband and that he has deserted her? She may be residing at her husband's house, but she is not residing with him. The puzzle does not end there. In Thomas v. Thomas (13), a husband had driven his wife out of the house and she obtained a maintenance order on the ground of his desertion. She afterwards returned to the house and occupied rooms in the house which were entirely separate from those occupied by him, a situation indistinguishable from that in Evans v. Evans (12). The Divisional Court held that she was still entitled to enforce her maintenance order because she had not resumed cohabitation with her husband. That means that the husband had deserted her and she was not cohabiting with him, but at one and the same time, if Evans v. Evans (12) is right, she was still residing with him. I cannot follow that. Indeed, there seems no good reason why Mrs. Thomas should have been able to enforce her order and Mrs. Evans should not. If Mrs. Evans, instead of getting back straight through the window, had stayed away a few nights so as to be able to say she had been "living apart" from her husband, she would, apparently, have been able to enforce her order just as Mrs. Thomas did: but, because she had nowhere else to go, she could not. It is impossible to suppose that the legislature intended such a result.

I think I can see how all this trouble has arisen. In Evans v. Evans (12) the Divisional Court were faced with an Act of Parliament which contained different phrases, "reside with" and "cohabit with," and they applied the well known rule of construction of legal documents that, if a draftsman uses different words, he presumably intends a different meaning. That, however, is by no means a safe guide to Acts of Parliament, as BLACKBURN, J., pointed out in Hadley v. Perks (14). The draftsman may change the wording simply to improve the style. The simple intention of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, was that a maintenance order was not to be enforceable while husband and wife were residing with one another or cohabiting with one another, but only while they were living apart or living separately and apart. This distinction is conveyed by various phrases. The parties must not be "residing with" one another. They must be "living separately and apart" or "living apart" from one another, or they must not be "cohabiting with" one another. All these phrases mean the same thing, to my mind. At least, I can see no sensible distinction between them. They all express the fact of separation. A

It seems also to have been assumed both in Evans v. Evans (12) and Thomas v. Thomas (13) that, before the Act of 1925, the wife, in order to get a maintenance order, had to show that she had quitted her husband's house. That was true in the case of cruelty or neglect, but not in the case of desertion. The Act of 1925 made no change in the law as to maintenance orders for desertion. In desertion the fact of separation was always necessary, but HILL, J., had previously pointed out in Jackson v. Jackson (3) ([1924] P. 26) that this might happen while the parties were living under the same roof. Before 1925, therefore, a wife in the position of Mrs. Evans could get a maintenance order for desertion and enforce it. If Evans v. Evans (12) is rightly decided, it means that the position of a deserted wife is worse since 1925 than before. I cannot think that the legislature intended such a result. B C

It may be said that it is unnecessary to consider Evans v. Evans (12), that that is a decision as to a maintenance order and not as to divorce, and that it turns on the wording of the Act of 1925 which is not in question here. I would point out, however, that desertion is desertion, whether so found by the justices or by the divorce judges, and it has the same meaning in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, as in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937. There are really only three choices, either to say that the line of the decisions in the Divorce Division is wrong, or to say that the decision in Evans v. Evans (12) is wrong, or to say that a deserted wife cannot enforce her maintenance order. Faced with this choice, I am of opinion that Evans v. Evans (12) was wrongly decided. Not only did CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dissent from it, but it has also been vigorously criticised by PROFESSOR GOODHART (64 L.Q.R. 8) and PROFESSOR GOWER. In my opinion, any wife in the position of Mrs. Evans is not only entitled to a maintenance order on the ground of desertion, but is also entitled to enforce it. D E

Relieved of Wanbon v. Wanbon (11) and Evans v. Evans (12) the law becomes consistent throughout this subject, and I agree with all that BUCKNILL, L.J., has said about it, and as to the application of it to the facts of this case. I agree that the appeal should be allowed. F

HARMAN, J. : Cruelty not being an issue in this court, the husband, in order to succeed in this suit, must show that his wife deserted him for a period of three years immediately preceding June 27, 1947, when the petition was presented. In fact, the husband and wife lived under the same roof till May, 1947, and, therefore, there can have been no desertion for three years in the ordinary sense of that word. It is, however, well settled now that there can be desertion, though the same roof has covered the parties even up to the time when the petition is heard, and the learned commissioner must have found in order to justify his decree that this was the state of things here. Desertion must connote, in my judgment, a real separation of one spouse from the other. There must be something more than a mere intention or design to end the conjugal society. That, no doubt, is the animus, but it is not the factum of desertion, and both elements are necessary, as the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Buchler v. Buchler (15) clearly shows. The learned commissioner accepted the evidence of the husband and rejected that of the wife, and I am prepared to accept that view, though I deprecate the language of hyperbole employed in G H the statement that it was the wife's intention to make the husband's life "a veritable hell on earth." But whatever this phrase may mean, it does not suggest desertion to my mind, though it does suggest cruelty on which the learned commissioner made no finding. The degree of separation necessary to constitute desertion has been discussed in a number of cases. Of these I would wish to rely on Smith v. Smith (1), a case decided by the learned President after a careful argument addressed to him at his request on the part of the King's Proctor. This case decided that there could be separation where the spouses lived in different parts of the same house, but it is to be noted that there was nothing else in common between them. This case is described by PILCHER, J., in Littlewood v. Littlewood (16) as the strongest case on the subject. He declined to go beyond it, and it may be taken as the high-water mark. I cannot think that the same learned judge can have intended to extend the doctrine in the later case of Wanbon v. Wanbon (11), though the report of that case makes it seem as if he did so. This case was an undefended cause and is not fully reported. It may well be that the facts brought it within the limits of Smith v. Smith (1) and, if so, the decision was justified. If not, I should not be disposed to follow it. I am of opinion that the true criterion is that of Smith v. Smith (1), not, of course, that the facts must be the same, but the degree of separation, and judged by that the husband must here fail. In this case there was a family home, a common table was kept and a common life to some extent maintained, to such a degree indeed that to an outsider the position did not appear abnormal. I cannot think that in these circumstances the wife, however badly she behaved to her husband, was deserting him, and, if so, he cannot obtain a decree on that ground.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Francis Miller & Steele, agents for Dickinson, Miller & Turnbull, Newcastle-upon-Tyne (for the husband); Smith & Hudson, agents for F. A. Waller & Hamilton, Newcastle-upon-Tyne (for the wife).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re CASTLE'S WILL TRUSTS. THE PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. FLOOD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), October 22, 26, 27, 1948.]

Will—"Surviving" two events—Satisfaction of requirement by persons living at date of second event only.

By his will, a testator, who died on Oct. 20, 1891, gave certain shares of his residuary estate on discretionary trusts for the benefit of his son, O.H.W., and his issue, and on the death of O.H.W. without issue to the testator's two daughters. He further directed that on the death of the daughters without issue the shares were to pass to H.C.F. for his own use and benefit absolutely. The will continued: "Provided always that if the said H.C.F. shall predecease me or shall be dead upon the happening of the event aforesaid [i.e., the death of the survivor of the daughters without issue] leaving issue of his own surviving me and the happening of the aforesaid event then such issue shall take and if more than one equally between them as tenants in common the share which the said H.C.F. would have taken had he been then living." O.H.W. died on Feb. 24, 1931, without having been married, and H.C.F. died on Dec. 28, 1937, leaving issue. The first daughter of the testator died a spinster on Sept. 14, 1947, and on Nov. 22, 1947, the second daughter died, also a spinster. Issue of H.C.F. survived both daughters.

HELD: although prima facie a gift to a class "surviving" an individual meant a class living at his death and did not extend to persons coming into existence after that date, where the requirement was that two events should be survived, it would properly be satisfied where a member of the class was living at the happening of the last of the two events specified, and, therefore, all issue of H.C.F. living on Nov. 22, 1947, even if born after the death of the testator, were entitled to take.

[AS TO VARIATION OF Prima Facie MEANING BY CONTEXT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 192-197, paras. 246-251; and FOR CASES, see A DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 574-581, Nos. 3911-4023.]

Case referred to :

- (1) Elliot v. Joicey, [1935] A.C. 209; 104 L.J.Ch. 111; sub nom. Re Joicey, Joicey v. Elliot, 152 L.T. 398; Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether, on the true construction of a will, a gift to persons surviving the testator and a certain event conferred beneficial interests on persons born after the death of the testator but living at the date of the occurrence of the said event. JENKINS, J., held that such persons were entitled to benefit. B

Geoffrey Cross for the plaintiff (the Public Trustee).

Drcoop for the first three defendants (children of H.C.F. living at the happening of both events). C

J. A. Wolfe for the fourth defendant (representing issue of H.C.F. born after the testator's death).

Peter Foster for the fifth and sixth defendants (legal personal representatives of the testator's two daughters).

JENKINS, J. : Having regard to my answers to the previous questions the shares are now held on trust for the testator's nephew, the Rev. Henry Castle Floud, D

" Provided always that if the said Henry Castle Floud shall predecease me or shall be dead upon the happening of the event aforesaid leaving issue of his own surviving me and the happening of the aforesaid event then such issue shall take and if more than one equally between them as tenants in common the share which the said Henry Castle Floud would have taken had he been then living." E

The question I have to decide is whether the class of issue entitled to participate is confined to issue who were living at the death of the testator and also on Nov. 22, 1947, or whether it extends to the issue of the nephew who were living on Nov. 22, 1947, but were not born until after the death of the testator. The question turns on the meaning of the expression " surviving " in the will. F

It must be regarded as settled by the decision of the House of Lords in Elliot v. Joicey (1) that the prima facie and ordinary meaning of " surviving " means " living at and after the event " and requires that the person who is to survive shall be living both at and after a particular point of time. So, prima facie a gift to a class of individuals " surviving " an individual means a gift to persons of that class living at the event in question and does not extend to persons coming into existence after that event. That prima facie meaning of the word " surviving," therefore, suggests that no issue of the nephew survived the testator within the meaning of the will unless they were in existence at the death of the testator, but it is to be observed that here the requirement is that issue should survive, not a single, but a double, event, i.e., both the death of the testator and the failure of the prior trust. It seems to me that this makes a material difference to the meaning of the word " survive." I think that, while fully accepting the meaning as living at the happening of the specific event, when the requirement is that two events should be survived, the word can be given proper effect by interpreting it as living at the happening of the last of the two events specified. When the requirement is to survive both the death of the testator and that of G H another named person, that requirement is met when a person is living at the date of the last of the events which has happened. If the prior trust had failed during the lifetime of the testator and the nephew had had issue after such failure but in the testator's lifetime who survived the testator, it seems plain that such issue would be entitled to take by virtue of being alive at the death of the testator, the later event.

A I think that that is the proper construction of the word "surviving" in this case, and that I am justified, on the true construction of this will and without departing from the general meaning of the word "survive," in deciding that a person living on Nov. 22, 1947, although not born until after the testator's death, is entitled to benefit. This conclusion is born out by the general form of the provisions of the will. It is to be observed that the share which the issue is to take is the share which the nephew would have taken had he been living. B For these reasons I hold that on the true construction of this particular will the gift over operates in favour of all issue of Henry Castle Floud who were living on Nov. 22, 1947, including those not born until after the death of the testator.

Order accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate.

C Solicitors: Druces & Attlee (for the plaintiff, and the fifth and sixth defendants); Speechley, Mumford & Craig (for the other defendants).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Approved. FOWLER v. BRATT. [1950]
1 All E.R. 662.

D E. H. BENNETT AND PARTNERS v. MILLETT.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), November 3, 1948.]

Agency—Estate agent—Commission—Contract to pay commission on introduction of a "purchaser able and willing to complete"—Able and willing purchaser found—Vendor's refusal to complete.

E After an interview with the defendant at which they were instructed to sell the defendant's house, the plaintiffs, a firm of estate agents, wrote to the defendant: "We confirm that in the event of our introducing a purchaser who is able and willing to complete the transaction, our commission will be in accordance with the recognised scale . . ." The court held as a fact that these words were the basis of the contract between the parties. F The plaintiffs introduced a prospective purchaser, whom the court found to have been at all times able and willing to purchase, but the defendant refused to complete. It was argued by the defendant that the qualification of the word "purchaser" in the plaintiffs' letter—"able and willing to complete the transaction"—was otiose and should be struck out, and, therefore, the plaintiffs had not performed the contract until they had introduced a purchaser who actually completed the purchase.

G HELD: the expression "a purchaser who is able and willing to complete the transaction" meant, not a person who did, in fact, ultimately purchase the property, but one who was prepared to purchase it at the seller's price, and, as the estate agents had found such a person, they were entitled to their commission.

H [AS TO REMUNERATION OF AGENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, pp. 256-263, paras. 431-436; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 1, pp. 488-503, 508-518, Nos. 1664-1728, 1753-1801.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper, [1941] 1 All E.R. 33; [1941] A.C. 108; 110 L.J.K.B. 131; 164 L.T. 313; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Giddys v. Horsfall, [1947] 1 All E.R. 460; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for commission.

The plaintiffs were a firm of auctioneers and estate agents and they claimed commission alleged to be due from the defendant under an agreement dated June 17, 1947, on the introduction to the defendant of a purchaser able and willing to complete the purchase of certain premises known as St. Martin's, Mapledale Avenue, Shirley, Croydon. The defendant contended that, as he had withdrawn from the transaction before completion, there had been no purchase and the plaintiffs had not found a purchaser within the terms of the contract. The court held that the plaintiffs had found such a purchaser and were entitled to their commission. The facts appear in the judgment. A

Sir John Cameron for the plaintiffs.

P. St. John Back for the defendant.

HILBERY. J.: On June 16, 1947, the defendant walked into the offices in Croydon of the plaintiff firm to inquire about a property, a photograph of which he had seen in the window of the plaintiffs' premises. The plaintiffs are auctioneers and estate agents. After making some inquiries, purporting to be made on behalf of a friend, about this particular property, the defendant instructed the plaintiff firm to sell a property known as "St. Martins," No. 24, Mapledale Avenue, Shirley, Croydon. He gave particulars of this house which had four bedrooms and two reception rooms, and occupied one-third of an acre of ground, and he instructed the plaintiffs that the purchase price was £8,500 unfurnished, and £12,500 if sold with the furniture which was in it. The following day the plaintiffs wrote a letter dated June 17 in these terms: B C

"Dear Sir. St. Martins, Mapledale Avenue, Shirley. Further to your call at our offices this afternoon, we write to confirm and thank you for your instructions for us to dispose of the freehold of the above premises at a figure of £8,500, vacant possession to be given on completion of the purchase. We confirm that in the event of our introducing a purchaser who is able and willing to complete the transaction, our commission will be in accordance with the recognised scale of the Auctioneers and Estate Agents' Institute, namely, 5 per cent. on the first £300 of the purchase price, 2½ per cent. on the next £4,700, and 1½ per cent. on the residue. We should like to make an inspection of the property in the near future, and will telephone to you for an appointment as arranged with our Mr. Bennett." D E

Following that letter, which the defendant, undoubtedly, received, the defendant arranged a date on which the plaintiffs made their inspection of the premises and took all the particulars that they wished, and the plaintiffs entered the property on their books and advertised it in local newspapers. There was no demur by the defendant to the terms of that letter. No answer was sent by him to it, but following it he allowed the plaintiffs to go on busying themselves in an effort to find a purchaser for the property. I use that word "purchaser" in a neutral sense, and not as more descriptive of a person who is looking for a property which he is willing to buy than of a person who actually completes a purchase. Subsequently, the plaintiffs, with the consent of the defendant, allowed a sub-agent to seek a person able and willing to pay the price of the property, and they found a Mrs. Bell who was willing to pay what the defendant finally instructed the plaintiffs was his minimum price (£7,500) and Mrs. Bell paid a deposit of £750. I find as a fact that she was at all times an able and willing purchaser of the property at the price of £7,500. The correspondence shows that solicitors on each side were instructed, and, finally, notwithstanding the pressure which Mrs. Bell was bringing to bear on the defendant to go on with the matter to enable her to take possession, the defendant refused to do so because he could not find alternative accommodation for himself and his wife and probably also his furniture. F G H

In those circumstances the plaintiffs say (1) that they were employed to act on the terms of the letter of June 17; and (2) that, in accordance with the terms set out in that letter, they have earned their commission on the scale which was also set out with particularity in the letter. In his defence, the defendant has raised more than one point. In the first place, he says: "My instructions were given at the interview, and they were to sell. I never contracted on the terms of the letter." In the second place he says: "The whole of the instructions to sell were at all times subject to this condition that I must have alternative accommodation. In other words, at all times I made it clear that I was only a seller for whom you could find a purchaser and in such way earn your commission if first I was found, or I found for myself, alternative accommodation." Lastly, he says: "Even if that is not right, and I am bound by the terms of the letter, then, as a matter of construction of that letter, you have not performed the services which you were employed to perform, and on which alone in accordance with the terms of your letter you are to be paid your commission."

[HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the defendant's first two contentions and held that the plaintiff firm were employed on the basis of their letter and that there had been no condition precedent to the sale that the defendant should have alternative accommodation. He proceeded:] The sole point in this case is the construction of the letter of June 17. It is odd, in face of the decision on the meaning of the word "purchaser" in Luxor (Eastbourne), Ltd. v. Cooper (1), and in contradistinction to it the decision of LEWIS, J., in Giddys v. Horsfall (2), that the letter in this case should have been written in this form. To put it shortly, in the Luxor case (1) the court held that where an agent contracts for a commission to be paid to him on finding a purchaser, he must find some one who, in fact, completes a purchase. In Giddys' case (2), where the agents stipulated for their commission as becoming payable to them in the event of their being instrumental in introducing a party prepared to purchase on the terms of the vendor's instructions, or on terms acceptable to him, the court held that the language there did not require the agents to find some one who actually completed a transaction of sale and purchase because the language was such that they could perform the duties they had to perform and earn their commission if they introduced a party prepared to purchase on the terms of the instructions given to them or on terms acceptable to the vendor. In this case, almost as though it were intended to set a fresh problem for the courts, the agents have used language which seems to fall somewhere between those two decisions, for here the words which the agents choose to use are: "We confirm that in the event of our introducing a purchaser who is able and willing to complete the transaction." Now, no person can be a purchaser in the strict sense of the word (and as construed by the House of Lords in the Luxor case (1)) unless he completes the purchase. He cannot complete the purchase unless he has been ready and willing to do it at all times. I cannot conceive of a purchaser who actually buys who was not ready and willing to buy and able to buy in as much as he pays the price which has been asked, and in consequence of that counsel for the defendant says that those words following the word "purchaser" in this contractual letter ought to be taken to be surplusage and merely otiose. He argues that those words should be struck out, and the contract should be construed strictly against the persons putting it forward. He says they have chosen to speak of a "purchaser," and that, for the reasons given, the qualifying words should be disregarded.

I have given careful consideration to that contention, but I do not think it would be right to give effect to it. Having considered these words very anxiously, in my view, the words "able and willing to complete the transaction" obviously indicate a qualification of the word "purchaser" which would not otherwise be there. To speak of a "purchaser" without any qualifying words, the courts have said, is to speak of one who actually does complete the contract of sale and purchase, but, in common parlance, one does not always speak of a purchaser in that limited sense of the word. "Buyer" certainly is a word of description in many business firms for a person holding a general office of buying for the firm. Though he does not buy anything for months, he remains a buyer. In ordinary parlance, I think we do not use the word "purchaser" as necessarily restricted to a person who actually completes a transaction of purchase and sale, and here in this letter, I think, the very fact that they add the words "who is able and willing to complete the transaction" shows that they are speaking of some one who is in the character of a buyer—who is taking the part, if I may borrow an expression from the stage, of a buyer—and is in a position to complete the transaction, that is to say, to become in the full sense of the term as construed by the courts an actual buyer who has completed the transaction of purchase and sale. I think that those words are a clear indication that what the plaintiffs were offering was their services for introducing a person able to buy at the figure asked by the defendant—a person willing and able to complete the transaction so as to become, in the strictest sense of the word, the purchaser. I think these are words of qualification which can be given a sensible interpretation, and should be given a sensible interpretation in the circumstances. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs because I hold the view, in giving the words that construction, that they have earned their commission.

Judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Solicitors: Kinch & Richardson, agents for Pringle & Co., Redhill (for the plaintiffs); Clutton, Moore & Lavington, agents for A. Rawlence, Croydon (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Applied. Re HOWELL (dec'd.). [1952] 1 All E.R. 363.

Re SHEPHERD. PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. HENDERSON AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), October 26, 27, November 5, 1948.]

Estate Duty—Legacy duty—"Further legacy . . . duty"—Settled legacy of £20,000—Duty payable on death of tenant for life—Payment out of capital of legacy or residue—Finance Act, 1947 (c. 35), s. 49.

The testator who died in 1919, bequeathed to the plaintiff (the sole surviving trustee) £20,000 upon trust to pay the income to his granddaughter, the first defendant, for life and on her death, in the event which happened, to her daughter, the second defendant, absolutely, and he directed the said sum of £20,000 be set aside and invested within three months from his death and to bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum from that date. By cl. 17, the testator declared "that all the before-mentioned legacies and specific and pecuniary bequests whether settled or otherwise . . . shall be paid free of all legacy and other death duties (if any) and that all such duties shall be paid out of my residuary estate." Clause 18 gave power to the trustees to provide for the payment of annuities by appropriation and so to free the residuary estate, which was, by cl. 19, given to the trustees upon the usual trusts for sale and conversion, and, by cl. 20, out of the moneys arising from such sale and conversion to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and legacies and "make provision for the payment of the annuities hereinbefore bequeathed and the duties on any legacies annuities or bequests bequeathed free of duty" and to hold the residue of the proceeds of sale and conversion in trust for such hospitals in London as his trustees should select.

Held: (i) on the construction of the will, the words conferring freedom from duties were confined to duties arising in consequence of the testator's death and not in consequence of the dispositions made by his will, and, therefore, on the death of the life tenant estate duty would be payable out of the capital of the legacy of £20,000 and not out of the testator's residuary estate.

(ii) the effect of the further legacy duty imposed by the Finance Act, 1947, s. 47, was merely to raise the rate of legacy duty payable under the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, and the duty under both those Acts was payable out of residue.

[As to "FREE OF DUTY" PROVISIONS IN WILLS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 299-301, para. 312; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 21, pp. 37, 38, Nos. 235-243.

FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1947, s. 49, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 40, pp. 507-509.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Re Wedgwood, Allen v. Public Trustee, [1921] 1 Ch. 601; 90 L.J.Ch. 322; 125 L.T. 146; 21 Digest 36, 226.
- (2) Re Palmer, Palmer v. Palmer, [1916] 2 Ch. 391; 85 L.J.Ch. 577; 115 L.T. 57; 21 Digest 35, 220.
- (3) Re Laidlaw, Wilkinson v. Lyde, [1930] 2 Ch. 392; 99 L.J.Ch. 463; 143 L.T. 761; Digest Supp.
- (4) Re Jones, Lambert v. Colbourn, [1928] W.N. 227; Digest Supp.
- (5) Re Stoddart, Bird v. Grainger, [1916] 2 Ch. 444; 86 L.J.Ch. 29; 115 L.T. 540; 21 Digest 37, 232.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the construction of a will, estate duty payable on the death of the first defendant, the life tenant of a settled legacy of £20,000 under the will, would be payable out of the capital of the settled legacy or out of the residuary estate of the testator, and whether legacy duty payable under (a) the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, and (b) under the Finance Act, 1947, s. 49 (being a duty which became leviable after the death of the testator) would be payable out of the legacy or residue. The judge ruled that estate duty was payable out of the legacy and legacy duty out of residue.

J. A. Wolfe, for the plaintiff (trustee under the will).

Winterbotham, for the first and second defendants, tenant for life and remainderman under the will.

Danckwerts, for the Attorney-General.

Curr. adv. vult.

Nov. 5. HARMAN, J., read the following judgment. William Shepherd, with whose estate this summons is concerned, was a successful builder who died in 1919 leaving a large fortune of which he disposed by his will dated Mar. 19 of that year. Of this document the plaintiff is now the sole trustee, having been appointed by cl. 1. By cls. 3, 5, 6, 9 and 10 the testator bequeathed various pecuniary and specific legacies. By cl. 8 he authorised his trustees for a period of twenty years after his death to continue out of income to pay the charitable subscriptions which he had made in his lifetime. By cls. 11, 12, 13 and 14 the testator bequeathed annuities, some of them immediate and some deferred. By cl. 16 he bequeathed to his trustees the sum of £20,000 upon trust to invest it and pay the income to his granddaughter, the first defendant, during her life, and, after her death, in the event which has happened, to her daughter, the second defendant, absolutely (though the event was not certain at the testator's death), and he directed this sum of £20,000 to be set aside and invested within three months of his death and to bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum if not so invested. Clause 17 of the will reads as follows :

"I declare that all the before-mentioned legacies and specific and pecuniary bequests whether settled or otherwise and all the said annuities whensoever payable shall be paid free of all legacy and other death duties (if any) and that all such duties shall be paid out of my residuary estate."

Clause 18 contained a power to the trustees to provide for the payment of annuities by appropriation and so to free the residuary estate which was, by cl. 19, given to the trustees upon the usual trusts for sale and conversion, and by cl. 20, the trustees were to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts and legacies and

" . . . make provision for the payment of the annuities hereinbefore bequeathed and the duties on any legacies annuities or bequests bequeathed free of duty," and to hold the residue in trust for such hospitals in London as the trustees should select. That selection has not yet been made, and the Attorney-General appears here to represent the hospitals which may be hereafter selected.

I am asked to determine three questions : (i) whether the estate duty which will or may become payable at the death of the first defendant, as tenant for life of the settled legacy of £20,000, will be payable out of the capital of that legacy or out of residue ; (ii) a similar question as to legacy duty under the Legacy Duty Act, 1796 ; and (iii) a similar question as to what is called the " further legacy duty " under s. 49 of the Finance Act, 1947. These are all future questions, but I think there are sufficient reasons why I should decide them now.

I will deal with the estate duty first. The question is whether the words conferring freedom from duty are confined to duties (a) arising in consequence of or on the testator's death, or (b) extend to all duties arising in consequence of the dispositions made by his will : see the judgment of LORD STERNDALE, M.R., in Re Wedgwood, Allen v. Public Trustee (1). The answer to this is a question of construction depending on the particular will under consideration : see the judgment of LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in Re Palmer, Palmer v. Palmer (2) ([1916] 2 Ch. 398), and the judgment of PICKFORD, L.J., at p. 401. It is, therefore, a question of ascertaining the testator's intention from the words he has used, but it is fair to say that there is by now a presumption that a testator only intends to provide for such duties as are payable by reason of his own death and that to rebut this presumption a clear intention to provide for further duties must be found : see the judgment of EVE, J., in Re Laidlaw, Wilkinson v. Lyde (3). There has been a great number of cases on this question, and I find it stated in the 1946 edition of HANSON ON DEATH DUTIES, at p. 139, that, since the decision in Re Wedgwood (1), there has only been one English case in which the wider construction has been adopted. That case is Re Jones, Lambert v. Colbourn (4). There the words were so wide, namely, " the due carrying out or giving effect to the dispositions made " by the will, " or incorporated in or incidental to the due administration of my estate," that they left no room for doubt, but, short of some such expression, it is hard now to think of a form of words which would be construed in the wider sense. In Re Stoddart, Bird v. Grainger (5), SARGANT, J., took the wider view, relying on the direction that legacies should be " paid and enjoyed " free of duty, and a further direction to the trustee to " provide for " all duties. Words hardly less strong appear in Re Laidlaw (3), but EVE, J., did not feel that they justified him in taking the wider view. He relied for the contrary view on an indication that the testator there anticipated that the amount of his residue would be known within a short time.

What, then, are the indications here ? Clause 17 simply refers to payment and not to enjoyment, and this is in favour of a narrow view. On the other hand, cl. 20 uses the words " make provision for " which were so much relied on by SARGANT, J., in Re Stoddart (5), and it is urged on me that the present testator clearly contemplated that the administration of his estate would remain open for a long time, having regard, in particular, to the authority given to his trustees to continue for twenty years to pay charitable subscriptions, and that, therefore, the argument as to convenience has no force. On the other hand, there is a positive direction to set apart this £20,000 fund at once, and that has always been taken as an indication that no further calls on residue shall come from that quarter. There is, in addition, the authority to appropriate for the rest of the annuities, and it is urged that the direction about making provision for duties is satisfied by the legacy duty with which

A I shall have to deal under Question 2. I come to the conclusion that the narrower view is right, and that, when the testator directed that this legacy should be paid free of duty, he referred to the period when it was paid to the trustees by his executors, and it matters not that at that time the executors and trustees were the same persons. Consequently, I answer Question 1 by holding that the duty falls on the legacy.

B As to Question 2, it was not disputed that the 1 per cent. legacy duty under the Legacy Duty Act, 1796, which will arise on the death of the first defendant, is payable out of residue. The reason for this is explained in Re Wedgwood (1), and the position is well settled. Legacy duty, where payable at different rates on a settled legacy, is not exigible on the testator's death except on the value of the first life interest, but it is, nevertheless, a sum owing to the Crown

C debitum in praesenti solvendum in futuro. Freedom from this duty was, therefore, enjoined by the will on any view, and residue must bear it.

Question 3 is necessarily a novel one. The Finance Act, 1947, s. 49, imposed what is called "a further legacy duty," and it is said that this, not having been a duty which arose or was charged at the testator's death, is a future duty and falls into line with the estate duty under Question 1 and not the legacy duty under Question 2. If this be right, it results in one of those absurdities arising out of a subtlety of the law which makes it stink in the nostrils of the public who cannot understand why what is in effect one half the legacy duty should be drawn out of one fund and the other out of another. I say "in effect" because in practice the section doubles the rate of legacy duty, and the event has happened which LORD STERNDAL, M.R., in Re Wedgwood (1), considered a bare possibility so unlikely as to be negligible. In my judgment, this is the effect of the new section at law as well as in practice. I hold that the so-called new duty is merely a raising of the rate of the old duty and that the two fall on the residue together.

Costs to be levied as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the residue.

F Solicitors: Moon, Gilks & Moon (for the plaintiff, the public trustee); Savory, Pryor & Blagden (for the first and second defendants, legatees under the will); Treasury Solicitor.

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

WARREN v. HENLYS, LTD.

G [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Hilbery, J.), November 8, 9, 1948.]

Master and Servant—Liability of master to third persons for acts of servant—Acts within scope of authority and course of employment—Threat by garage customer to report employee—Assault on customer by employee.

H Erroneously believing that the plaintiff had tried to drive away from the garage without paying or surrendering coupons for petrol which had been put into the tank of his car, a petrol pump attendant used violent language to him. The plaintiff paid his bill and gave up the necessary coupons, and, after calling the police, told the pump attendant that he would report him to his employers. The pump attendant then assaulted and injured him. In an action for damages for personal injury by the plaintiff against the employers:

HELD: the defendants were not liable for the wrongful act of their employee, since that act was one of personal vengeance on the employee's part and was not done in the course of his employment, it not being an act of a class which the employee was authorised to do or a mode of doing an act within that class.

Observations of BANKES and SCRUTTON, L.JJ., in Poland v. Parr (John) & Sons ([1927] 1 K.B. 240, 243), applied.

[AS TO THE MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR WRONGFUL ACTS OF HIS SERVANT IN THE COURSE OF EMPLOYMENT, see HALSBURY, Vol. 22, pp. 225-230, paras. 403-409; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 34, pp. 125-131, Nos. 964-1006.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Poland v. Parr (John) & Sons, [1927] 1 K.B. 236; 34 Digest, 117, 890.
- ✓ (2) Dyer v. Munday, [1895] 1 Q.B. 742; 64 L.J.Q.B. 448; 72 L.T. 448; 59 J.P. 276; 34 Digest 130, 996.
- ✓ (3) Bayley v. Manchester, Sheffield & Lincolnshire Ry. Co., (1873), L.R. 8 C.P. 148; 42 L.J.C.P. 78; 28 L.T. 366; 8 Digest 113, 765.

ACTION for damages for personal injuries.

The defendants were the occupiers of premises known as Henly's Garage on the North Circular Road, London, where they employed Thomas Edwin Beaumont as their servant for the purpose inter alia of selling petrol to motorists, receiving payment in cash, and accepting the surrender of petrol coupons. On May 12, 1947, Beaumont assaulted the plaintiff by a blow on the face with his fist, thereby causing him injury, loss and damage. At the hearing the defendants called no witnesses, but contended that the assault and beating were not carried out by Beaumont in the course of his employment by them and that he was not acting in pursuance of any duty owed to them by him, and that, accordingly, they were under no liability for the assault. HILBERY, J., held that there was no evidence that Beaumont was acting in the course of his employment when he committed the assault. He, therefore, discharged the jury and gave judgment for the defendants. The facts appear in the judgment.

Beney, K.C., and George Pollock for the plaintiff.

Paull, K.C., and Cassels for the defendants.

HILBERY, J.: Not without some hesitation, I have come to the conclusion, that there is no evidence before the court on which a jury could be entitled in law or in fact to fix the defendants with vicarious responsibility for the act of their servant, Beaumont, of which the plaintiff complains.

The plaintiff arrived at Messrs. Henlys', the defendants', garage and service station on the North Circular Road at about 10.30 p.m. on May 12, 1947. He was driving with his wife in a utility van and he was followed by two of the artistes of his troupe in a Ford truck. He drove into the service station with a view primarily to getting some air pumped into a tyre, but he asked for petrol to be put in his utility van. Beaumont, who was the defendants' pump attendant, served the petrol to the utility van. While he was doing so, the plaintiff ascertained from his men in the Ford truck that they, too, would be glad to have some petrol put into that truck. When the utility van had received the petrol ordered for it, the plaintiff got into the driving seat and began to drive away from the pump, to make room for the Ford truck to draw ahead. The plaintiff, when he drove off, was followed hotly by Beaumont, who had made up his mind, apparently, that the plaintiff intended to abscond with the utility van and the petrol without giving money or coupons for it. It was an entirely erroneous conclusion, but he ran after the plaintiff, and, using violent language to him, called on him to stop. The plaintiff stopped, and was incensed at the incivility with which he was being treated by Beaumont. He demanded petrol for his Ford truck in addition to that which had been put into the utility van, but it was refused by Beaumont and they repaired to the cash desk where the plaintiff paid for the petrol he had had and delivered

A the appropriate coupons. The plaintiff came away from the cash desk, and, seeing a police car going by, he jumped into his utility van, drove after it, stopped it, and brought it back with Police-constable Simonds. The plaintiff was in a violent temper and the other members of his party were all very excited, and Simonds asked Beaumont what his version was. Beaumont said: "This man [the plaintiff] came into the garage a few minutes ago and asked me to put five gallons into his utility. This I did and he then got into the driver's seat, started up, and commenced to pull away. As he had not given me any money or coupons for the petrol, I shouted for him to stop, which he did. He then started shouting about my conduct and incivility to him and said he would report me." "I asked the plaintiff if he agreed with this," said the constable, "and the plaintiff said 'That is quite right,' but the plaintiff said that Beaumont also swore at him and he added: 'If you are not going to do anything, I shall certainly report his conduct to Henlys, as I am a good customer of theirs.'" The constable tells me that he thought he had to some extent soothed the parties to the argument, and he turned to go to his car, and as he was about to step into it he heard a scream. He looked round and the plaintiff was lying on his back on the concrete, unconscious. The officer thereupon went back to Beaumont, asked him to account for this, and took down the statement which Beaumont made to him. Beaumont said: "I asked Warren if he was going to report me to the firm and he said 'Yes,' so I gave him one on the chin to get on with. I hope he is not hurt too much." The constable thereupon took Beaumont into custody. Those words of Beaumont are of high importance. He is there giving in his own words and in his own way his reason for having struck the blow.

D On those facts certain things seem clear. The plaintiff had had his car filled with petrol. Beaumont had performed the duty he was there to perform regarding the petrol and had seen to it that the customer paid. The only reasonable inference that can be drawn is that, although the Ford truck had pulled up, no petrol was going to be delivered to that truck. So far as the plaintiff and Beaumont were concerned, the plaintiff's business with the defendants was at an end. He had paid his money and handed over the coupons. He had actually gone off thereafter on a matter which concerned him personally in his relations with Beaumont—that is, he had gone for the police and made a complaint to them about Beaumont's conduct towards him, and when the policeman said he was not taking action because he did not consider it a police matter, the plaintiff had actually turned to go to his car to leave, clearly, I think, showing—and no jury could otherwise find—he had finished with the defendants at that stage. Then Beaumont speaks to him, asks him if he is going to report him, and, hearing that the answer is in the affirmative, gets hold of him, twists him round and strikes him, an act of personal retribution for something which Beaumont thought would affect him personally.

G Is there any evidence in those circumstances to go to a jury on the case which is sought now to be made, to place vicarious responsibility for this act on the defendants? Without going through a lot of authorities, it seems to me that I cannot do better than adopt the general statement of the law expressly cited and approved by the Court of Appeal through the mouth of BANKES, L.J., in his judgment in Poland v. John Parr & Sons (1) ([1927] 1 K.B. 240). It is a statement of law which is to be found in SALMOND ON TORTS, 10th ed., p. 89. It is in these terms:

“A master is not responsible for a wrongful act done by his servant unless it is done in the course of his employment. It is deemed to be so done if it is either (a) a wrongful act authorised by the master, or (b) a wrongful and unauthorised mode of doing some act authorised by the master.”

It is equally accurately said in SALMOND a little further on (p. 90), when dealing with the same topic :

" . . . if the unauthorised and wrongful act . . . is not so connected with the authorised act as to be a mode of doing it, but is an independent act, the master is not responsible : for in such a case the servant is not acting in the course of his employment, but has gone outside of it."

I think that accurately states the law, so I ask myself : Is there any evidence here on which a jury could find that this assault, committed in the circumstances which I have just given, was so connected with the acts which the servant was expressly or impliedly authorised to do as to be a mode of doing those acts ? It seems to me the answer must be "No." Of course, as in Dyer v. Munday (2), if a manager, who, in the course of the very duties in the business goes to recover furniture, so conducts himself in recovering the furniture that he commits an assault, that is a tortious mode of doing the class of act which he is authorised to do. Without multiplying the ways in which this matter has been expressed and judges have sought to mark the limitations or bounds within which a master is to be held liable, I may use one more quotation. It is from SCRUTTON, L.J., in Poland v. John Parr & Sons (1) ([1927] 1 K.B. 243) :

"To make an employer liable for the act of a person alleged to be his servant the act must be one of a class of acts which the person was authorised or employed to do. If the act is one of that class the employer is liable, though the act is done negligently or, in some cases, even if it is done with excessive violence. But the excess may be so great as to take the act out of the class of acts which the person is authorised or employed to do."

Clearly, there is no evidence here that this act belonged to the class of acts that Beaumont was authorised to do. In extension of what SCRUTTON, L.J., has said, I have also examined the matter in the light of that statement of the law which I have already read from SALMOND ON TORTS, so as to ask whether, although it was not of the class of acts which Beaumont was authorised to do, it was so connected with that class of acts as to be a mode of doing some act within that class. It seems to me that it was an act entirely of personal vengeance. He was personally inflicting punishment, and intentionally inflicting punishment, on the plaintiff because the plaintiff proposed to take a step which might affect Beaumont in his own personal affairs. It had no connection whatever with the discharge of any duty for the defendants. The act of assault by Beaumont was done by him in relation to a personal matter affecting his personal interests, and there is no evidence that it was otherwise. Counsel for the plaintiff has relied strongly on the passage so often cited from the judgment of WILLES, J., in Bayley v. Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Ry. Co. (3), where WILLES, J., said (L.R. 7 C.P. 420) :

"A person who puts another in his place to do a class of acts in his absence, necessarily leaves him to determine, according to the circumstances that arise, when an act of that class is to be done, and trusts him for the manner in which it is done ; and consequently he is held answerable for the wrong of the person so intrusted either in the manner of doing such an act, or in doing such an act under circumstances in which it ought not to have been done ; provided that what was done was done, not from any caprice of the servant, but in the course of the employment."

It is unfortunate the words "in the course of the employment" seem to have given rise to so much difficulty, but, if one thinks of the course of the employment as meaning, coupling that phrase with what SCRUTTON, L.J., said, in the course of doing an act which was one of the class of acts which the servant was authorised or employed to do, the matter becomes reasonably clear. In those circumstances, it is equally clear what WILLES, J., is meaning to indicate by the proviso that what is done by the servant must be done, not from any caprice on his part, but in the course of his employment. I ventured, in the course of argument, to say that "caprice" sometimes suggests a lightness in the conduct of the servant, while the tortious acts in question may be grave and done by a servant for his own personal ends or advantage or to satisfy, perhaps, his own personal malice or desire for revenge, as in this case.

In the circumstances, I cannot see any evidence on which a jury could be asked to find that the defendants were responsible, and there must be judgment for the defendants.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Solicitors : Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker (for the plaintiff) ; Simon, Haynes, Barlas & Cassels (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

A/S TANKEXPRESS v. COMPAGNIE FINANCIERE BELGE DES PETROLES S.A.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Wright, Lord Uthwatt, Lord du Parcq, Lord Morton of Henryton), June 8, 9, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, and November 9, 1948.]

Charterparty—Hire—Default in payment—Method of payment agreed between parties—Extrinsic evidence to prove method.

By a charterparty, dated Mar. 18, 1937, shipowners let the vessel P. to charterers for 7 years at a monthly rate of hire commencing on the date of delivery. Clause 11 of the charterparty provided that : "Payment of the said hire is to be made as follows : In cash monthly in advance in London. In default of such payment the owners shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said vessel from the service of the charterers, without prejudice to any claim they (the owners) might otherwise have on the charterers in pursuance of the charter." The vessel was delivered on the 27th of the month. On Sept. 3, 1939, the vessel was in Venezuela and certain disputes arose between the owners and charterers on the outbreak of war. The disputes were settled on Sept. 25, 1939, and on that date, in accordance with the practice thitherto always followed, the charterers sent to Hambro's Bank in London a cheque for the amount of hire due on Sept. 27, and notified the owners at Oslo and their broker in Paris of this payment. Owing to delay in post caused by war conditions, the cheque was not received by Hambro's Bank until Oct. 3. On Sept. 29 the owners telegraphed Hambro's Bank asking if they had received the remittance, and on Sept. 30 the bank replied stating that they were unable to trace that the payment had been made. The owners, thereupon informed the charterers that the hire had not been received and that they considered the charterparty cancelled. The matter was submitted to arbitration and the arbitrator found inter alia : "That the accepted method between the parties during the currency of the charter with regard to the payment of hire, had been for the charterers to make the payment of hire in London at the office of Hambro's Bank, Ltd., by sending a cheque in favour of Hambro's Bank, Ltd. . . . to be placed by them to the credit of the owners with the Kristiana Folkbank, Oslo . . . The payment of hire had been regularly and properly paid in this way during the currency of the charter, and had always been paid on its due date until the payment of the hire due on Sept. 27, 1939."

Held : if payment on the due date had not been excused by special circumstances payment even a day late would not have protected the charterers even though no blame or fault could have been imputed to them : Nova Scotia Steel Co., Ltd. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co., Ltd. (1899) (5 Com. Cas. 106), disapproved ; but extrinsic evidence was admissible to prove the method of payment accepted by both parties (dictum of LORD DAVEY, in Bank of New Zealand v. Simpson ([1900] A.C. 187 ; 82 L.T. 104), applied), namely, payment to Hambro's Bank by cheque posted at such time as would in the ordinary course of post reach London on the 27th of the month, and the charterers, who were not to blame for the delay in the receipt of the payment in London, had acted in accordance with that method with the result that, in the absence of notice that in future they required more strict compliance with cl. 11 of the charterparty, the owners were not entitled to cancel the charterparty on the ground that payment of hire by the charterers had been delayed.

Panoutos v. Raymond Hadley Corporation of New York ([1917] 2 K.B. 473 ; 117 L.T. 330), applied.

Per LORD DU PARCQ : I have not been persuaded that a charterer who has agreed to pay a month's hire in advance is absolved from making the payment if, although the owners have not sought to repudiate the contract, the ship is not, in fact, at the disposal of the charterers for some days immediately before and after the first day of the month of hire. It would be more reasonable to argue that, if the hire is not paid "in advance" the owners are absolved from giving those services in respect of which the hire has to be paid.

Observations by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON on the form of the cessation of hire clause in the charterparty.

[AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF SHIP IN DEFAULT OF PAYMENT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 30, pp. 299, 300, para. 493 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 41, p. 363, Nos. 2107-2114.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Nova Scotia Steel Co. v. Sutherland S.S. Co., (1899), 5 Com. Cas. 106 ; 41 Digest 363, 2111.
- (2) Bank of New Zealand v. Simpson, [1900] A.C. 182 ; 69 L.J.P.C. 22 ; 82 L.T. 102 ; 17 Digest 325, 1364.
- (3) Macdonald v. Longbottom, (1860), 1 E. & E. 987 ; 29 L.J.Q.B. 256 ; 2 L.T. 606 ; affg., (1860), 1 E. & E. 977 ; 17 Digest 325, 1357.
- (4) Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government, [1923] 1 Ch. 385 ; 92 L.J.Ch. 273 ; 129 L.T. 290 ; on appeal, sub nom. Kelantan Government v. Duff Development Co., [1923] A.C. 395 ; 21 Digest 618, 2059.
- (5) Panoutos v. Raymond Hadley Corp'n. of New York, [1917] 2 K.B. 473 ; 86 L.J.K.B. 1325 ; 117 L.T. 330 ; 12 Digest 434, 3516.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal.

A dispute having arisen between the owners of the Norwegian tanker, Petrofina, and charterers whether the owners were entitled to cancel a charterparty dated Mar. 18, 1937, between the parties, the arbitrator, subject to a Case stated by him for the opinion of the court, found that the owners were entitled to withdraw the vessel. The award was set aside by ATKINSON, J., who made an award in favour of the charterers. An appeal from this decision came before a Court of Appeal consisting of two Lords Justices, and, they being divided in opinion, the judgment of ATKINSON, J., was affirmed. The owners appealed to the House of Lords who now dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgments.

The House took time for consideration.

Le Quesne, K.C., and Ashton Roskill for the appellants.

Sir William McNair, K.C., and Eustace Roskill for the respondents.

Nov. 9, 1948. LORD PORTER: My Lords, this appeal comes to your Lordships from the Court of Appeal consisting of two Lords Justices, who differed as to the result to be arrived at, and, consequently, the finding of the learned judge who tried the case was confirmed. The dispute concerns the right of the owners of the Norwegian tank vessel Petrofina to withdraw that vessel from the service of the charterers from and after Sept. 30, 1939.

A By a charterparty dated Mar. 18, 1937, the owners let that vessel to the charterers for 7 years. Under that charterparty the rate of hire was 5s. 6d. per ton on the vessel's dead weight capacity commencing on and from the day of her delivery and at and after the same rate for any part of a month, and was to be paid in cash monthly in advance in London. In default of such payment the owners were to have the faculty of withdrawing the vessel from the service of the charterers: By cl. 13 of that charterparty it was provided that the whole reach of the vessel's holds, decks and burthen should be at the charterers' disposal. B By cl. 14 the captain was to prosecute his voyages with the utmost despatch. By cl. 16 he was to be under the orders and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency or other arrangements. By cl. 27, in the event of deficiency of men or stores, repairs, breakdown of machinery or boilers (whether partial or otherwise), collision or stranding preventing the efficient working of the vessel C for more than 48 hours, or breach of orders or neglect of duty on the part of the captain causing delay, the payment of hire was to cease from the commencement of such loss of time until the vessel should again be in an efficient state to resume her service. Clause 34 contained the usual exceptions in favour of the owners, but ended by providing that nothing in it should limit the charterers' right to suspension of hire for any period the vessel might not be at the charterers' D disposal for a period exceeding 48 hours. The charterparty also contained an arbitration clause and incorporated the Chamber of Shipping War Clause and a special war clause both of which made provision as to the mutual obligations of the parties in the event of war breaking out during the currency of the charter, but their contents are immaterial so far as this case is concerned and it is not necessary to set out their terms.

E On Sept. 3, 1939, the vessel was in the neighbourhood of Venezuela, a dispute took place between the owners and charterers with regard to the voyage which the charterers then intended to make, and the owners declined to allow the vessel to be at the charterers' disposal until this dispute had been settled. Eventually, however, it was settled on Sept. 25, 1939, at which time the vessel was lying in F Guiria roadstead in ballast, the captain having received instructions from his owners not to commence loading until instructed by them. The settlement was effected by two telegrams both dated Sept. 25—the first of which was sent by the owners to the charterers in the following terms:—

G “Yours Mejlaender we awaiting your telegraphic confirmation direct that Petrofina not to be sent to belligerent ports without our consent stop further understood we cover kroner 4½ million your account any delay caused at Venezuela not to be considered off hire stop we reserve right divert vessel safe ports if agreement discussed Copenhagen not reached telegraph.”

The reply was in the following terms:—

H “Confirm Petrofina not to be sent to belligerent ports without your consent stop other terms your cable all right stop please hurry despatch.”

Thereupon the owners on the same date again telegraphed to the charterers: “Yours to-day instructed master to commence loading,” and followed this up with a telegram to the master running “Commence loading for Lisbon.” Unfortunately, that cable, which was addressed to “Master Petrofina c/o Stanocoven Guiria,” never reached the master with the result that the ship was never placed at the charterers' disposal for loading. The owners had been requested by the charterers on Sept. 17 to cable the captain c/o Stanocoven Caripito and did send one cable so addressed on Sept. 19, but all other cables were addressed to him c/o Stanocoven Guiria and with the exception of the cable of Sept. 25 reached him safely. That cable, by some mistake, was delivered to the charterers' agent at La Guaira who thought it referred to a vessel about to load at that port and awaited her arrival. The result was that the master was, so far as he knew, still under orders not to allow the charterers to load. The vessel appears to have been delivered to the charterers on the 27th of the month. Accordingly, as soon as the dispute had been settled, the charterers despatched from Brussels to Hambro's Bank, Ltd., a letter containing a cheque for £3,766 13s. 0d., being the agreed net amount due on Sept. 27 for the month's hire in advance, and by other letters informed the owners at Oslo and their brokers in Paris of the despatch of the cheque. In so doing they were acting in accordance with the procedure previously adopted in transmitting the hire. The letter, however, was not received by Hambro's Bank until Oct. 3 and meanwhile, on Sept. 29, the owners telegraphed to them in London: "Have you received Petrofina hire from Compagnie Financiere—please telegraph yes or no eventually stating amount." To this telegram Hambro's Bank replied on Sept. 30: "Yours yesterday cannot trace receipt of hire Petrofina." (In fact, the remittance was not received until Oct. 3 owing to the delay in post caused by war conditions and was then returned on the owners' instructions by the bank to the charterers). On receiving this telegram the owners telegraphed to the charterers: "Accordance telegram received from Hambro's Bank to-day hire not received consequently consider charterparty cancelled" and to the captain: "90 Stanocoven Guiria. Hire not paid stop loading await instructions acknowledge." This message was received by the master on Sept. 30. The charterers did not accept the owners' claim to cancel and replied by a telegram saying: "Cannot understand your telegram payment hire having been made as usual according our letter 25th. Hold you responsible for all eventual damage."

In addition to the matters stated above the arbitrator also found (i) that the practice between owners and charterers was for the latter to pay the hire on the 27th of each month deducting from the hire any amount for time off hire during the currency of the previous month, (ii) that both parties were unaware that in consequence of the non-receipt of the telegram of Sept. 25 the master had not placed the vessel at the disposition of the charterers, and (iii) that the accepted method between the parties during the currency of the charter with regard to the payment of hire had been for the charterers to make payment of hire in London at the office of Hambro's Bank by sending a cheque in favour of that bank, drawn on the Italo-Belgian Bank of London, to be placed by them to the credit of the owners with the Kristiana Folkbank, Oslo, and the payment of hire had been regularly and properly paid in this way during the currency of the charter and had always been paid on its due date until this payment of the hire due on Sept. 27. On these facts and findings the arbitrator, subject to a Case which he stated, found that the owners were entitled to withdraw the vessel. This award was set aside by ATKINSON, J., who upheld the alternative award in favour of the charterers. From his decision an appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal which, owing to the illness of SCOTT, L.J., consisted of two Lords Justices and, they being divided in opinion, the judgment of ATKINSON, J., was affirmed.

My Lords, in these circumstances the case for the owners can be put in the simplest possible terms. The charterparty, they say, requires payment on a specific date which, in the events which happened, is the 27th of each month with the right of withdrawal of the ship if payment is not made on that date; the charterers failed to pay on the due date; and, consequently, the ship was rightly withdrawn. It matters not that the charterers carried out their part in the way usually adopted. Their duty was to pay in London on the due date and they have not done so. The charterers put forward a number of arguments in answer to this claim. They say, first, that the right of withdrawal only arises if they are in default, and, having paid in the usual and recognised way, they are not in default though, in fact, their cheque did not reach Hambro's Bank on the 27th of the month. Secondly, that, even assuming that their obligation was to place a cheque in the hands of Messrs. Hambro in London on that date, the owners being themselves in default by withholding the services of the ship, were not in a position to withdraw those services. Thirdly, that default implies a deliberate act and does not include an accidental omission for which they were in no way to blame. Fourthly, following the decision of BIGHAM, J., in Nova Scotia Steel Co. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co. (1), they did pay as near the due date as their contract compelled, and, finally, that in order to make the settlement of Sept. 25 work, a term must be implied that a payment made in the ordinary course immediately on its conclusion would be in time.

My Lords, it is a commonplace that the phraseology still adopted in the case of the charter of a ship where her services are put at the disposal of a charterer but she is not demised are deceptive. The ship is not leased or withdrawn. Her services and that of her crew are put at the disposal of the charterers when the charter begins and when the withdrawal of the ship is spoken of it merely means that those services are no longer supplied. Consequently, so the charterers contend, the owners are prima facie in breach of their obligations if they withdraw those services, and in the present case there is no finding which excuses them.

My Lords, whichever party may be right in the dispute which took place at the end of September, I can find no provision in the charterparty which would entitle the owners to withhold the services of the ship at any rate after it was settled on Sept. 25, but the fact that they instructed the captain not to load does not necessarily absolve the charterers from the obligation to pay the advance hire on the stipulated date. It would only do so if the obligations of furnishing the ship and paying hire were mutually inter-dependent. It was maintained on behalf of the charterers that the owners did more than withhold their vessel temporarily and that in substance they renounced the charterparty and thereby excused the charterers from further performance until the dispute was cleared up and the mutual obligations of the charter again resumed. I doubt, however, whether such a state of affairs has, in fact, been established and, even if it had, I doubt whether there is any half-way house between acceptance of the repudiation and continuance of the charter with the consequent obligation to continue to pay hire, but, having regard to my opinion on another aspect of the case, I do not think it necessary to reach a conclusion on this topic or on the question whether the payment of hire and provision of the services of the ship are mutually dependent one upon the other. So, too, I do not think it necessary to come to a conclusion as to the analogous question whether the owners are precluded from withdrawing the ship while they are themselves in default, nor whether they are or are not entitled to sue for the hire so soon as the due date has been reached. The charterers contended that no hire was payable while the ship was not at their disposal, and, therefore, not only was non-payment during such a period not a default, but that in any case during a time at which they were not given the services of the ship, the right of withdrawal ceased. As I have said I do not think it necessary to decide these questions and prefer not to pronounce on them.

Two further arguments on behalf of the charterers are, I think, unsound. Default, in my opinion, means in this charterparty a failure without excuse to pay hire on the due date. Apart from some special circumstances excusing performance it is enough to constitute default that payment has not, in fact, been made. Neither deliberate non-performance nor negligence in performing the contract is required. Nor do I think that, if payment on the due date was required and not excused by special circumstances, payment a day or two late was timeous enough. In my view, Nova Scotia Steel Co. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co., Ltd. (1) was wrongly decided so far as this point is concerned and is none the less wrong though the provision in that case was not for payment simpliciter but for punctual and regular payment. Further, if the obligation to pay on the due date remained of full force under the terms of the charterparty I should not myself imply a term in the settlement of Sept. 25 that payment by letter of that date was enough. Certainly, if the owners are right in contending that, if the settlement had not been effected, the charterers would have been under an obligation in all circumstances to pay the month's hire in advance and must do so however much the owners were in default or had broken their contract, I see no reason for implying such a term. But even if so extreme a position be not maintained, I do not see why a dispute between the parties, even if it results in the temporary withdrawal of the ship, necessitates the implication that the charterers shall be excused from taking any step towards implementing their obligation to pay until the dispute is settled. It is true that they could not be certain of the length of time the ship was off hire between Aug. 27 and Sept. 27 until an agreement had been reached, but they could still have paid the full sum and deducted from future hire whatever might ultimately be agreed to be deductible for the period during which the ship was off hire.

Whatever view may be taken of these matters I think that the charterers are entitled to succeed in their first contention. This result must follow, if it is to follow at all, from the findings of the arbitrator. He states them in paras. 5, 7 and 9 of the award. He says in para. 5 that the charterers despatched their cheque to Hambro's Bank in London from Brussels on Sept. 25 and on the same day wrote to the owners at Oslo and their brokers in Paris of the despatch of the cheque. All this, as he finds, was in accordance with the procedure which had previously been adopted. The delay in delivery in London resulted from the outbreak of war. In para. 7 he sets out the practice between owner and charterers during the currency of the charter under which hire was paid on the 27th of each month, but from the gross sum was deducted any reduction for time off hire during the previous month. Paragraph 9 sets out the method accepted by both parties for payment of hire which was effected by sending a cheque in favour of Hambro's Bank to be placed by them to the credit of the owners. The arbitrator adds "the payment of hire had been regularly and properly paid in this way during the currency of the charter and had always been paid on its due date until this payment..." The last part of this sentence I take to mean that the cheque had always hitherto been received in London on the 27th of each month. In a contract between charterers and shipowners, when the former are in Brussels, the latter in Oslo and their brokers in Paris, and when the contract stipulates for payment in cash in London, obviously some further terms are required to regulate its performance. Admittedly, Hambro's Bank was nominated as the place of payment, a cheque drawn on a foreign bank substituted for cash, and receipt by post accepted, at any rate, when the letter arrived by or before the 27th of the month, the 25th being, apparently, the accepted day for posting. In these circumstances I think the true inference to be drawn is that the method of performance of the contract was varied by an arrangement for payment to Hambro's Bank by cheque posted at such time as would in the ordinary course of post reach London on the 27th of the month. "Regularly and properly" are the words used by the arbitrator and "properly" I think means in accordance with the accepted practice. No doubt, the owners could at any time have insisted on a strict performance of the contract after due notice, but they were not, in my view, entitled suddenly to vary the accepted method of performance without first notifying the charterers in time to enable them to perform the contract in the manner demanded. I think, therefore, that payment was duly made in accordance with the practice adopted and accepted between the parties and in the way and at the time stipulated. At one time some reliance appears to have been placed on behalf of the charterers on the terms of cl.

27 and 34, but that attitude was not persisted in before your Lordships, or, indeed, in the Court of Appeal, and, having regard to the grounds of my conclusion, the question whether the ship was off hire between Sept. 25 and 30 becomes immaterial. For my own part, I would decide this case solely on the ground that the charterers have performed their contract by the method accepted by both parties and would leave all other contentions to be disposed of when their determination is required for the decision of another case. I would dismiss the appeal and order that the owners do pay the charterers' costs.

LORD WRIGHT : My Lords, the dispute between the parties is whether the shipowners were entitled to cancel the charterparty dated Mar. 18, 1937, between them as owners of the Norwegian tanker Petrofina and the charterers. The question comes before your Lordships on a Case stated by the third arbitrator submitting certain questions to the opinion of the court. As the full terms of the Case and of the charterparty are before the House it will here only be necessary to state that the charter was for a period of 7 years, with an option to the charterers to extend for a further period of 3 years at a monthly rate of hire commencing on and from the date of her delivery. The charterparty was not a demise and "delivery" was the term used to describe the rights to the service of the vessel enjoyed by the charterers under the contract. The hire was to continue until the hour of her re-delivery to the owners. There was no express provision for the interruption of the hire between the dates of delivery and re-delivery except cl. 27, in which it was provided that in various events payment of hire should cease. It was, however, clear that that clause was not material in the facts of the case. There were, however, the usual provisions for the event of loss of the vessel and for the case where payment of hire fell due when she was on her way to the port of re-delivery. Clause 11 of the charter is that on which the dispute primarily turns. It provides that :

"Payment of the said hire is to be made as follows : in cash monthly in advance in London. In default of such payment the owners shall have the facility of withdrawing the said vessel from the service of the charterers, without prejudice to any claim they (the owners) might otherwise have on the charterers in pursuance of the charter."

The day of the month on which the vessel was "delivered" under the charter was the 27th. That fact determined the day of the month on which the first and subsequent advance payments of hire were due.

When war broke out the vessel was in Venezuela expecting to load for the charterers a cargo of oil, but some disputes arose on the outbreak of war. Their nature is not stated in the Special Case and is not here material. These disputes were settled on Sept. 25, 1939, on terms stated in cables exchanged between the owners and charterers by which the owners were given rights in excess of those given to them by the charter in the event of war. The terms of the settlement were that the vessel was not to be sent to belligerent ports without the owners' consent, that the war risk insurance cover was to be increased to 4½ million kroner, and that any delay at Venezuela was not to be considered as time off hire. The charter was in this way varied to the advantage of the shipowners. The vessel had been withdrawn from service for some days pending the settlement, but the owners, when the disputes were settled on Sept. 25, sent instructions to the master to commence loading for Lisbon, in accordance with the charterers' telegram to the owners immediately after the settlement was reached—"Please hurry despatch." By an accident for which neither party was responsible, the master did not receive the owners' orders, but still acted on the instruction he had received from them not to load until instructed. The accidental difficulty was not known at the time to either party, and on Sept. 25, immediately the settlement was arrived at, the charterers sent from Brussels to Hambro's Bank in London, a cheque for the agreed net amount of hire due in advance from Sept. 27, and wrote to the owners at Oslo and to the owners' brokers in Paris stating what they had done. What they did was in accordance with methods previously adopted in remitting the hire, but on Sept. 29 the owners' bank in Oslo, Kristiana Folkbank, telegraphed to Hambro's Bank in London asking if they had received the hire, and for reply by telegraph. Hambro's Bank wired on Sept. 30 that they could not trace receipt of the hire. The owners then on the same day telegraphed to the charterers that Hambro's Bank had telegraphed that the hire had not been received and they considered the charterparty was cancelled. The charterers telegraphed in reply that they could not understand the owners' telegram, payment for hire having been made as usual on Sept. 25, but the owners maintained their cancellation, returned the cheque, and on Oct. 6 chartered the vessel on their own account. The matter then went to arbitration.

The Special Case states that the reason why Hambro's Bank did not receive the letter from the charterers enclosing the hire until Oct. 3 arose owing to the delay in the post occasioned by the state of war. The charterers had no intention of failing in their obligation to pay, which, as cl. 11 provided, was to be performed by payment in cash in London. The payment of hire was a vital matter because, if there was default of "such payment" (i.e., in cash monthly in advance in London), the owners were entitled to cancel the long and valuable charter. Default in payment, that is, on the due date is not, in my opinion, excused by accident or inadvertence. The duty to pay is unqualified so far as the express terms of the charterparty go. I think this is the true construction of the terms of the contract, and is confirmed by the cases cited in argument. A dictum or decision of BIGHAM, J., in Nova Scotia Steel Co. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co. (1), has been relied on as an authority that a certain latitude was permissible so that payment made two days after the due date did not constitute a default in payment, but I cannot agree that so drastic a departure from the specific words of the charter can be supported. In that case the clause provided for regular and punctual payment. These adjectives, however, add nothing to the stringency of the simple and unqualified language in the charter before this House. I think that so much of BIGHAM, J.'s, judgment as conceded a latitude as to the date of payment is erroneous in law and should be overruled. The importance of this advance payment to be made by the charterers is that it is the substance of the consideration given to the shipowner for the use and service of the ship and crew which the shipowner agrees to give. He is entitled to have the periodical payment as stipulated in advance of his performance so long as the charterparty continues. Hence the stringency of his right to cancel. But, at least, that makes it essential to understand precisely what constitutes "payment." All that the clause says is "In cash monthly in advance in London." Cash to whom? What is meant by cash—coin or currency or transfer of credit? The shipowners were in Oslo and the charterers in Brussels. How was transfer to take place? It is not enough to say that the charterer must act at his peril. He is entitled to know what he is to do. Such matters are essential to be specified in order to ascertain whether the charterers have made the payment and at what time they made it. To meet these difficulties a method of performance was "accepted between the parties" as stated in para. 9 of the Special Case which ran as follows:

"The accepted method between the parties during the currency of the charter with regard to the payment of hire had been for the charterers to make the payment of hire in London at the office of Hambro's Bank Ltd. by sending a cheque in favour of Hambro's Bank Ltd. (drawn on the Italo-Belgian Bank Ltd. of London) to be placed by them to the credit of the owners with the Kristiana Folkbank, Oslo, and the payment of hire had been regularly and properly paid in this way during the currency of the charter and had always been paid on its due date until this payment of the hire due on Sept. 27."

This is a finding of fact which was necessary to fill up the gap in the written charter. Evidence was admissible for this purpose :

“ Extrinsic evidence is always admissible, not to contradict or vary the contract, but to apply it to the facts which the parties had in their mind and were negotiating about.”

So the rule was stated by LORD DAVEY, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Bank of New Zealand v. Simpson (2). The situation of the parties in this case required some definition of what constituted payment beyond the bare usual and conventional words of cl. 11 of the charterparty. How that definition was effected appears from para. 9 of the Special Case. In the Bank of New Zealand case (2) the question was whether the words “ estimate of the cost of works ” included the cost of the land plus the engineer’s commission. LORD DAVEY said ([1900] A.C. 187) :

“ These words point to something which was known to and in the contemplation of both parties to the contract, and with reference to which they contracted ; and, in order to construe and apply the contract, you must ascertain what was included in “ the estimate of £35,000 ” on the reduction of which the contract depended.”

Here “ payment in cash in London ” must involve some definition of what was to be done by the charterers in order to effect payment, the mode and machinery of performance in the contemplation of the parties. The third arbitrator has found what the parties contemplated. He does not say on what evidence he proceeded. It must have been extrinsic and additional to the actual words of the contract which did not contain the necessary words of specification. He may have found it in the declarations of the parties before the contract was made as in the authority just cited, or in the machinery actually employed or in some other evidence. This House cannot go behind his finding or inquire on what evidence he acted. It is enough that he found that there had been an accepted method between the parties with regard to the payment of hire under the charter. LORD DAVEY, in his judgment, proceeded to give other instances in which courts have received evidence in order to give a specific content to general expressions used in the contract. He quoted LORD CAMPBELL’s words in Macdonald v. Longbottom (3), saying ([1900] A.C. 189) :

“ ‘ There cannot be the slightest objection to the admission of evidence of this previous conversation, which neither alters nor adds to the written contract, but merely enables us to ascertain what was the subject-matter referred to therein ’.”

What was there in question was the meaning of the words “ your wool.” Equally here the relevant subject-matter was “ payment in cash in London.” The necessary definiteness is supplied by para. 9 of the Special Case. A similar ruling is to be found in Kelantan Government v. Duff (4). In that case the finding of an arbitrator that there was to be implied in the deed a contract to construct a railway was upheld. LORD CAVE, L.C., ([1923] A.C. 413) referred to some relevant stipulations and considerations which he quoted and said :

“ These stipulations may not be enough by themselves to lead to an implication of a contract to construct the line ; but I am not prepared to say that these considerations, coupled with evidence of facts of which the courts know nothing, and into which they are not entitled to inquire, cannot properly have led the arbitrator to his conclusion.”

He had already pointed out that the implication was not contrary to the deed. It is true that in that case the arbitrator was judge both of fact and law, but that does not affect the general significance for the present case of the words I have quoted.

Payment by cheque is, indeed, only conditional payment until the cheque has been cleared and the credit transferred. As I read para. 9 of the Special

Case, the third arbitrator, in finding that "the payment had been regularly and properly paid in this way" during the currency of the charter and had always been paid on its due date until this payment of the hire due on Sept. 27, is finding that the allowance of a two days' course of post was inter alia the correct procedure under the contract. The trouble was the failure in the course of post. Paragraph 9 of the Special Case is clear. The third arbitrator is finding, not only what the accepted method of payment was, but also that "the payment of hire had been regularly and properly paid in this way." That means, I think, that the sending of the cheque constituted payment for the purpose of cl. 11 of the charter. Then he added that the payment of hire "had always been paid on its due date until this payment of the hire due on Sept. 27." He has found that payment of hire had been regularly and properly paid in "this way," that is, by sending the cheque to Hambro's Bank. He was, I think, taking note that the cheque was only conditional payment, and adding that no difficulty had arisen in London, no doubt because there was no delay in the post and the cheque was duly honoured by means of the ordinary machinery of the clearing house so that eventually the charterers' bank, the Kristiana Folksbank, received the credit. There was no question of the solvency of the charterers or of the goodness of their cheque. The effect of the method was simply to put on the shipowners the inconvenience of any delay in the course of post, which because of the war happened on the critical occasion and resulted in a delay between Sept. 27 and Oct. 3. Some such risk may always be incidental to international business involving the transmission of cash, and in the light of the facts as to the accepted method, it results that the risk of that delay fell on the shipowners. In my judgment, it follows that no default in payment of hire can be attributed to the charterers and the owners were not entitled to claim to cancel the charter. I should, therefore, answer the third arbitrator's question in the Special Case for the opinion of the court in that sense.

There was a further and alternative way of looking at the position which would require the same answer to the question propounded in the Special Case. The third arbitrator has found in para. 9 of the award what was the accepted way of paying in cash in London. The owners, it is contended, having accepted that method for the earlier months, could not suddenly without reasonable notice insist that the charterers should have adopted a different method of paying the hire and withdraw the vessel on the ground that the charterers were in default of payment. I think this contention is sound on the principle laid down in Panoutos v. Raymond Hadley (5). The contract there was for the sale of goods by instalments subject to a confirmed credit opened by the buyer. The buyer opened a credit which was not confirmed. Notwithstanding this breach of the contract, the seller made some shipments and received payments by means of the credit. Then, without any previous notice, he cancelled the contract for the balance on the ground that there was no confirmed credit. It was held by the Court of Appeal that he could not cancel in that way. The contract, it is true, was not changed by the buyer's failure to provide the agreed credit, but the seller could not, having waived strict compliance by the buyer with the contract terms in this respect, put an end to the contract as to the future performance without giving the buyer an opportunity of complying with the condition. LORD READING, C.J., in giving the judgment of the Court of Appeal, said ([1917] 2 K.B. 479):

"I cannot find any authority to support the proposition that, when one party has led another to believe that he may continue in a certain course of conduct without any risk of the contract being cancelled, the first-mentioned party can cancel the contract without giving any notice to the other so as to enable the latter to comply with the requirement of the contract."

In that case the buyer was admittedly in breach, and the breach was capable of simple and obvious correction in the future deliveries. The present is a fortiori a case for the application of this principle which is that of fair dealing and justice. Here, even if the opinion I have just stated on the first point is not right, the charterers were adopting the agreed method of making the payments from one place to another. Hence, while the shipowners were entitled to insist for the future months of the charter on what might be regarded as a more correct fulfilment of the terms of cl. 11, they could only do so on giving reasonable notice of their intention and could not cancel until the notice had operated. On this alternative view also the shipowners would not be entitled to cancel the charter in the events which happened.

These conclusions render it unnecessary to express any opinion on the remaining questions raised in the Case. One question I take to be whether a term should be implied in the settlement of Sept. 25 that sufficient time should be allowed to enable the charterers to make the necessary payment in time to avoid forfeiture. In different circumstances something might be said in support of such an implication, but it is not necessary to consider it in view of the conclusions I have expressed. The other question I may notice is the question whether the owners had not legally disentitled themselves to enforce the forfeiture by failing in fact, though not in intention, to restore the vessel to the service of the charterers when the withdrawal of the vessel from the charterers' service had terminated in consequence of the settlement so that the vessel was being without justification withheld from their service when the notice of cancellation was given. That question, again, it is not material to decide in view of my conclusions already stated. I only wish to add that I do not express any opinion on hypothetical cases in which the right of cancellation given by cl. 11 may not be available to the shipowner because of some legal bar affecting him. I should dismiss the appeal.

LORD UTHWATT (read by LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON): My Lords, clause 11 of the charterparty, so far as material, is in the following terms:

"Payment of the said hire to be made as follows: In cash monthly in advance in London. In default of such payment the owners shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said vessel from the service of the charterers . . ."

It was found by the arbitrator that the hire normally became due on the 27th of each month.

Two short questions of construction arise on the clause. First, reliance was placed by the charterers on an opinion expressed by BIGHAM, J., in Nova Scotia Ltd. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co. Ltd. (1), where it was held that payment made two days after the day appointed for payment "was a regular and punctual payment within the meaning of the charterparty, and was not made too late." In my view, this opinion is wrong, unless there were other provisions in the charterparty there under consideration which had the effect of putting a substantial gloss on the meaning of the words "regular and punctual payment." A stipulation for payment on a fixed day or for punctual payment on a fixed day (unless controlled as to meaning by other provisions of the document) means exactly what is said. Payment is not made on the fixed day if it is made later. Parties are at liberty to make such bargains as to dates as appeal to them and full effect must be given to such bargains however unreasonable it may appear that the exact terms should be insisted on. Courts of equity, indeed, in appropriate cases relieve against failure to pay on a stipulated day, but, in so doing, they do not affect to modify the terms of the bargain, though they alter the result of failure to comply with them. Secondly, it was argued that there was no default of payment unless the charterers, though not having a legal justification or legal excuse, were in some sense blameworthy or at fault in not making the payment. If this construction were accepted, then it was argued that in the particular circumstances of the case, no blame or fault could be imputed to the charterers. They were victims, not sinners. I do not propose to consider the effect of those circumstances, for, in my opinion, "in default of payment" has in this charterparty no meaning other than "on failure so to pay." The phrase "default" on its face relates to the payment, not to the qualities of the payer. The remaining question is whether in light of the finding of the arbitrator as to the accepted method between the parties with regard to the payment of hire there had, in fact, been default of payment on Sept. 27. But for the parties coming to some working arrangement, the charterers—a Belgian corporation—with cash in hand, would have had to search for the shipowners—a foreign corporation—in London, and, inasmuch as a corporation can act only through agents, pay the cash to some agent of the shipowners in London duly authorised to receive the cash, it being the duty of the shipowners to provide and duly notify to the charterers some person duly authorised to receive payment on their behalf. Some arrangement was obviously necessary in the interests of the shipowners as well as the charterers. The "accepted method" specified by the arbitrator contains the arrangement, and it is, indeed, a sensible arrangement from the point of view of both parties. So long as the arrangement stood, it represented an agreed method of working out the obligation as to payment imposed by the charterparty, as distinct from an agreement to vary its terms. So long as it stood, the shipowners could not demand, nor the charterers insist on making, payment otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the arrangement. The accepted method as found by the arbitrator is, in my opinion, to be looked at in the same manner as a commercial bargain. The arbitrator is specific in the use of the phrase "by sending a cheque drawn on" the charterers' London bank and it would be toying with unrealities to treat this as meaning anything but sending in the ordinary course of post a cheque drawn on the named bank, which on presentation was duly met. In an arrangement for the common convenience of the charterers and shipowners I see no reason for not giving the word "sending" its proper meaning. "Sending" means sending and does not involve receipt, just as "specified day" means a specified day and does not include later days. In neither case is there over-indulgence in a passion for accuracy. How, then, does the matter stand? I fail to see that it is implicit in this particular arrangement that the charterers are to take the risk that the agreed machinery, to which they must adhere, fails in a particular instance to perform the functions that both have assigned to it. There is no reason why that should be implicit. The charterers have done their part. In the ultimate analysis the post is, in the matter in hand, working for the shipowners. In my opinion, therefore, the charterers, having complied with the working arrangement as to payment involved in the accepted method, had not breached the contract. In the result, the cheque reached the shipowners' bank on Oct. 3. In my opinion, the shipowners were (subject to the cheque being duly honoured) bound to accept that cheque so sent and so received as representing by virtue of the working arrangement the payment due to be made on Sept. 27. I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD DU PARCQ: My Lords, one of the questions formulated by the arbitrator for the consideration of the court was in the following words:—

"Whether, on the facts stated, and on the assumption the hire became due on Sept. 27 notwithstanding the fact that the captain had not received the owners' instructions to load, the charterers were excused from paying the hire on Sept. 27 owing to the fact that the charterers' letter of Sept. 25 was delayed in the post."

The wording of this question is, perhaps, open to some criticism, but, when it is read together with, and in the light of, the facts found, it may be said at least to give rough expression to one of the contentions of the charterers at your Lordships' Bar. I believe that this contention was sound, and that the right answer to the question is "Yes." If I am right, this appeal can be disposed of on a short and simple ground.

A The charterparty which contains the contract between the parties is dated Mar. 18, 1937. Hire was to be paid "in cash monthly in advance, in London." The first payment was made on the day when, in the language of the charterparty, the vessel was "delivered," and thereafter, the parties are agreed, a payment fell due on the 27th of each month. When payments are made in advance, it is possible that events may show that there has been an over-payment, and the parties had adopted a sensible and not unusual practice by which the charterers were permitted to deduct from the hire payable such sum as represented the amount paid for time off hire during the currency of the previous month. The clause of the charterparty which contains the express words as
B to the payment of hire which I have already quoted went on to provide that in default of such payment the owners should have the faculty of withdrawing the vessel from the service of the charterers. Having regard to the practice as to payment, it is right to treat the 27th of each month as the due date under the contract, and on that view I have no doubt that, if each party had been minded to insist on a literal performance of the contractual obligation, a payment made
C even a day late would not have sufficed to protect the charterers against cancellation. I cannot agree with the view expressed by BIGHAM, J., in Nova Scotia Steel Co., Ltd. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co., Ltd. (1) that a payment of hire made two days after the prescribed time "was a regular and punctual payment within the meaning of the charterparty and was not made too late." The learned judge's decision in that case may have been right, but, notwithstanding the respect which I have for any opinion of his, I cannot doubt that this dictum
D was wrong.

The terms of the charterparty in the present case were thus clear and precise as to the time, mode and place of payment, except in one particular. Payment was to be made in London—but at what place in London, and to whom? No answer to these questions is supplied by the charterparty. The owners were a corporation with, so far as appears, no office in London. The charterparty did not name
E any person authorised to receive payment on their behalf. It was obvious that some arrangement had to be made to enable the contract to be carried out. This was of course recognised, and the arbitrator's findings (set out in para. 9 of the Special Case) show the form which the arrangement took. He says:

"The accepted method between the parties during the currency of the F charter with regard to the payment of hire had been for the charterers to make the payment of hire in London at the office of Hambro's Bank Ltd. by sending a cheque favour of Hambro's Bank Ltd. (drawn on the Italo-Belgian Bank Ltd. of London) to be placed by them to the credit of the owners with the Kristiana Folkbank, Oslo, and the payment of hire had been regularly and properly paid in this way during the currency of G the charter and had always been paid on its due date until this payment of the hire due on Sept. 27 [viz., Sept. 27, 1939]."

My Lords, it appears to me that these findings leave no room for doubt that the parties had, not indeed varied the contract, but adopted for the time being a substituted mode of performance of the contract which was acceptable to, and accepted by, each of them. If a contract provides for payment in cash, the H party to whom payment is due may accept in substitution payment by cheque. Instead of money, a creditor may be willing to accept meal or malt, and he may be willing to postpone the date of performance of a contractual duty. No one would doubt this, if a single payment were due under a contract. One who has plainly manifested his willingness to accept a substituted method of performance cannot, when payment is made in the accepted manner, take advantage of some provision in the contract which gives him a remedy in default of payment. It is true that in the present case your Lordships are concerned, not with a single payment, but with payments which fell due monthly over a long period, but I think it can hardly be disputed that, where periodical payments have to be made, a substituted method of payment which has been "accepted between the parties" from the beginning must be regarded as fully satisfying the requirements of the contract until timely notice is given, by one or other of the parties, that he withdraws his acceptance of it. That such notice might be given effectively I do not doubt. The distinction between varying a contract and acceding to a variation of the mode of performance of it is well established in our law and, as I have said, there was no variation of the contract in the present case. I conclude, therefore, that, if the charterers, when the time came to make the payment due in September, 1939, in fact acted in accordance with the "accepted method," the owners were not entitled, on the ground that, through no fault of the charterers, receipt of the payment was delayed, to exercise a remedy which was open to them only "in default of" the payment stipulated by the contract. A B

The question then is whether, in September, 1939, the charterers did follow the "accepted method." They sent a cheque, and they sent it, as on each previous occasion they had sent their cheque, through the post. It is not suggested that there were not funds in the bank to meet it or that it would not have been met on presentation. They sent it on Sept. 25. Normally it would have arrived by Sept. 27, but, as the arbitrator has found, "owing to the delay in the post occasioned by the state of war," Hambro's Bank did not receive it until Oct. 3. There is no finding, and nothing in the Special Case to suggest, that the charterers were negligent in not posting it earlier, or that they had any reason to expect that there would be an unusual delay in transmission. What they did was done (I now quote from para. 5 of the Special Case) "in accordance with the procedure that had been previously adopted in remitting the hire." C D

My Lords, to say in these circumstances that the owners were entitled to do what they could only do "in default of payment," that is, to withdraw the vessel from the service of the charterers, is to affirm a proposition which does not accord with good sense, good business, or good law. I say this with the utmost respect for the argument of counsel for the owners, who, of course, put their case as forcibly as it could be put. They asked your Lordships not to construe too literally or too precisely the words in which the arbitrator set out the "accepted method." These were, they suggested, mere narrative, not intended to convey the impression that the owners had given up, or suffered to be modified, any of their contractual rights. They protested against a reading of the words which, they said, laid undue stress on the word "sending." Further, relying on the finding of the arbitrator that the payment of hire, until September, 1939, had always been paid on its due date, they argued that it was an essential condition of the "accepted method" that the cheque should arrive in London not later than the 27th of the month. If it was delivered later, they said, payment could not be said to have been made on that date, and the owners were entitled to their drastic remedy under the charterparty. I have been anxious not to lay too much stress on any words used by the arbitrator, but I must observe that your Lordships are not now interpreting the loose language of an inartistically drawn contract or the careless words of an inexperienced witness, but language used in a Special Case which may be assumed to have been chosen with precision by the arbitrator, who is, your Lordships were told, an experienced solicitor. He cannot be supposed to have set out facts which he did not consider to be relevant to the questions involved, and, indeed, the facts which he has found in para. 9 are directly relevant to the question which I began by quoting. The words "the accepted method between the parties" cannot be explained away as a mere equivalent to some such phrase as "the method which the charterers had, in fact, adopted without objection on the part of the owners." They must surely mean that the owners had not only acquiesced in the method, but had also approved its continuance at least until they chose to notify the charterers that E F G H they withdrew their acceptance. I see no reason to give the word "sending" any but its natural meaning. If the owners were willing that payment should be made by cheque, it was natural and businesslike for them to agree that the charterers, a corporation resident in Brussels, should be permitted to send the cheque from Brussels to London, and, as the parties showed by their conduct and course of dealing, they both recognised that there was no better way of sending it than by post. Whatever form of transmission is adopted, there is a possibility of delay, though it may be a slight possibility. If one party elects to rely on the postal service, or on any messenger of his own choice, he has to bear the responsibility for his agent's delay, but when, as in this case, both parties are agreed that a cheque is to be sent, and it is, in fact, sent by suitable, and normally expeditious, means, the creditor must run the risk of delay equally with the debtor. It seems to me to be hopeless to contend that the owners' acceptance of the method of payment was subject to a condition, unexpressed but implied, that, if the cheque did not arrive in London on Sept. 27, the charterers, though they were not to blame for the delay, should be treated as having made default, and so would incur the risk of losing a contract of great value. If such a condition had been expressly stated, the charterers might well have thought that they were being asked, not to conform to a sensible business arrangement, but to walk into a trap. It was said with great force by counsel for the owners that the owners would never have agreed that the mere sending of a cheque should be equivalent to payment. Here I agree with him. The owners cannot truly be said to have received payment until they received the proceeds of the cheque. There is always a risk that a cheque may be lost in transit, especially when it has to cross the sea, and since all men, and even banks, are capable of error, it may, through some blunder, not be met, although there are funds to meet it. In either of these events the charterers would, no doubt, remain liable to pay the hire due, but in neither case would the delay in payment justify cancellation of the contract. The owners have not gone so far as to contend that the receipt of a cheque would not in the circumstances be a sufficient performance of the contract if it arrived too late to be cleared on the 27th of the month. It follows that they had accepted a system which involved, on their own showing, a possible delay in actual payment. The risk of delay in the post was hardly more serious than the risk of delay in clearing the cheque. That these risks should be accepted by the owners is not surprising. It is much more surprising that they notified the charterers on Sept. 30 of their decision to cancel the contract without making any inquiry of them whether the cheque had been despatched.

For the reasons I have given I am satisfied that the owners have misunderstood their rights, and I agree with the decision of ATKINSON, J., though on grounds different from his and from those of BUCKNILL, L.J. I will only add two observations with regard to the other contentions on which the charterers chiefly relied before the learned judge and in the Court of Appeal. First, I have not been persuaded that a charterer who has agreed to pay a month's hire in advance is absolved from making the payment if, although the owners have not sought to repudiate the contract, the ship is not, in fact, at the disposal of the charterers for some days immediately before and after the first day of the month of hire. It would surely be more reasonable to argue that, if the hire is not paid "in advance," the owners are absolved from giving those services in respect of which hire has to be paid. It must be remembered in this connection that the course of dealing between the parties was such that any sum overpaid in respect of time off hire in the previous month could be deducted from each monthly payment. Secondly, I doubt whether the dispute which arose between the parties after the outbreak of war, as to the rights and wrongs of which your Lordships are hardly in a position to judge, and the fact that until the parties came to terms on Sept. 25 the owners were refusing to put the ship at the disposal of the charterers, ought to affect your Lordships' decision. I am not myself convinced that any term can be implied in the agreed settlement to the effect that a payment which (ex hypothesi for the sake of this argument) would otherwise have been too late could properly be made by dispatching a cheque after the negotiation of the settlement. I need not, however, say more about this aspect of the cause, because, in my view, the charterers do not need the protection of any such implied term. They sent a cheque. They sent it in due time. They were not in default, and are entitled to recover damages for the heavy loss which the owners' wrongful repudiation of the contract has inflicted on them. I am for dismissing the appeal.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON : My Lords, I have had the opportunity of reading in print the speech which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend LORD DU PARCQ. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed for the reason which he gives, and I also agree with his comments on Nova Scotia Steel Co. Ltd. v. Sutherland Steam Shipping Co. Ltd. (1). I have not found it necessary to form a concluded opinion on the other contentions of the charterers to which my noble and learned friend refers, but I desire to make some comments on cl. 27 of the charterparty, as its meaning and effect were very fully discussed in the course of the argument, and I understand that a clause in this form frequently appears in charterparties. To my mind, this clause is one which would very readily give rise to doubt and litigation. In saying this, I intend no reflection on the draftsman of the charterparty now before your Lordships. No doubt, he merely adopted a form which is generally in use, but I venture to think it is time that the form was revised. I shall now read cl. 27, inserting the numerals (1) to (7) and the letters (a) to (g) for a purpose which will shortly appear.

" 27. (1) In the event of loss of time through deficiency of men or stores, repairs, breakdown of machinery or boilers (whether partial or otherwise), collision or stranding, or damage preventing the efficient working of the vessel for more than 48 running hours, or breach of orders or neglect of duty on the part of the captain causing delay, (a) the payment of hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; and (2) should the vessel from any of the aforementioned causes put into any other ports than those to which she is bound under the instructions of the charterers, (b) the port charges, pilotages, and other expenses at those ports, loss of time consequent upon putting in, shall be borne by the owners; also (3) should the vessel put back while on voyage, by reason of any accident (c) the hire shall be suspended from the time of her putting back until she be again in the same position and the voyage resumed therefrom; but (4) should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather (d) such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' risk and expense. (5) In the event of detention of the vessel by authorities at home or abroad in consequence of legal action against the owners of the vessel, unless brought about by charterers whereby the vessel is rendered unavailable for charterers' service (e) the charter shall be suspended until the service can again be resumed. (6) In the event of the nation to which this vessel belongs becoming engaged in hostilities, (f) the hire to cease during the continuance of such hostilities, if the charterers find it impossible to employ the vessel in consequence. It is agreed that all detention or loss of time provided for in this clause and not paid for shall count as part of the guaranteed time specified under this charter. All graving dock charges to be at owners' expense. (7) Time in and waiting turn to enter graving dock (g) not to count as on hire. In which event owners are to have the right to employ the ship on their own account."

It will be observed that the clause deals with seven different sets of circumstances in which "loss of time" may occur, and states in each case the effect which such loss of time is to have on the financial arrangements between the parties. For the purpose of stating this effect the following phrases are employed:—(a) “The payment of hire shall cease” during a specified period. (b) “Loss of time . . . shall be borne by the owners.” (c) “The hire shall be suspended” during a specified period. (d) “Such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers’ risk and expense.” (e) “The charter shall be suspended” during a specified period. (f) “The hire to cease” during a specified period. (g) Time in and waiting turn to enter graving dock “not to count as on hire.” Thus, seven different phrases are used, in one and the same clause, and certainly they are not intended to convey seven different meanings. Nor does it appear that all the phrases used have a clear and certain meaning to persons well versed in commercial law. To take one example only, in the present case your Lordships heard a very interesting argument on the question whether the first of these seven phrases meant that during the specified period the charterers were entitled to decline to pay the hire, even if a monthly payment became due under cl. 11, or whether the phrase was directed only to the computation of the amount of the monthly instalments payable by the charterers. In the course of his argument counsel referred to all the other six phrases which I have quoted, and sought to draw some deduction from them. I do not propose to express any opinion, which would clearly be obiter, as to the meaning of this difficult clause, but I feel sure that it would be possible to express the intention of the parties more clearly and more simply. I believe that each of the various events specified in this form of clause has been inserted by reason of some decided case, but even if it is necessary to retain the list of events, it is surely unnecessary to employ seven different phrases of which some, at least, are not free from ambiguity, to describe what is to be the result of each of these events.

Appeals dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Sinclair, Roche & Temperley (for the owners); Ince, Roscoe, Wilson & Griggs (for the charterers).

[Reported by C. ST. J. W. NICHOLSON, Barrister-at-Law.]

Re WALTER'S WILL TRUSTS. STUART v. PITMAN AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), November 4, 5, 1948.]

F Will—Accruer—Accruer “to the shares of the daughters of mine who shall at the time of the death of such daughter not have been married”—Implication of requirement of survival.

G A testator, who died on Nov. 15, 1888, by his will gave certain securities to trustees to divide into as many parts as there should be daughters of his living at his death, and to appropriate one part to each daughter. He directed that the share of each daughter who should have attained the age of 21 years and should be for the time being unmarried or should have married or should marry with the consent of a certain person was to be held on trust for that daughter for life and thereafter for the daughter’s issue as she should appoint. In default of issue the trustees were directed to pay the income of the daughter’s share to any surviving husband, and subject thereto “ . . . the share of such daughter and the . . . income thereof . . . shall go over and be added by way of accruer to the shares of the daughters of mine if any who shall at the time of the death of such daughter not have been married with such consent as aforesaid and if more than one such share shall be added in equal portions or subdivisions to and between or among such respective shares . . . ” The testator was survived by eight daughters, of whom only two, L. and G., married, both with consent. The six spinster daughters all predeceased L. and G.

L. died on Oct. 31, 1945, and G. died on Feb. 3, 1947, neither leaving issue, and neither being survived by a husband.

HELD: on the true construction of the testator's will there was no justification for limiting the accruer to the shares of daughters living at the date of the accruer, especially as the accruer was to the shares of the daughters and not to the daughters personally, and, therefore, the shares of L. and G. accrued on their respective deaths to the shares of the deceased unmarried daughters.

[AS TO ACCRUER CLAUSES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 364-368, para. 413; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 34, pp. 1215-1217, Nos. 10507-10533.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Lassence v. Tierney, (1849), 1 Mac. & G. 551; 2 H. & Tw. 115; 15 L.T.O.S. 557; 43 Digest 643, 790.
- (2) Hancock v. Watson, [1902] A.C. 14; 71 L.J.Ch. 149; 85 L.T. 729; affg. S.C. sub nom. Re Hancock, Watson v. Watson, [1901] 1 Ch. 482; 43 Digest 643, 792.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the construction of an accruer clause in a will. The facts appear in the judgment.

Elverston for the plaintiff, the sole trustee of the will.

E. I. Goulding for the first defendant, the personal representative of L., one of the testator's married daughters.

Rink for the second defendant, the Public Trustee, the trustee of the will of William Walter, junior.

H. E. Francis for the third defendant, representing the estate of a deceased son of the testator.

A. C. Nesbitt for the fourth defendant, the personal representative of G., one of the testator's married daughters.

JENKINS, J.: The testator died on Nov. 15, 1888, leaving a will dated Dec. 20, 1883, which, with two codicils, was duly proved after his death. The testator had four sons and eight daughters. His will was primarily directed to making provision for his daughters, and the question which I have to decide concerns the destination of the settled shares in the trust fund provided by the testator of the two last of his daughters to die, all the children being now dead, namely, Mrs. Amy Lipscomb, who died on Oct. 31, 1945, and Mrs. Annie Greeves, who died on Feb. 3, 1947. The only other facts which I think are necessary to make the will intelligible are that the two daughters I have mentioned were the only daughters of the testator to marry, Mrs. Greeves having married in the testator's lifetime with his consent, and Mrs. Lipscomb having married in 1892 with the consent of the trustees of the will. That question of consent was relevant to a provision in the will. Neither of these two ladies had any children.

Turning to the will, the testator recites that he is possessed of £20,000 odd in Consols, and £400 in Government New 3 per cent. stock, or thereabouts. He recites the state of his family consisting of 12 children, 4 sons and 8 daughters, setting out their names. He further recites that he has already provided for his eldest son, William Walter junior. He proceeds to bequeath to two named persons, whom he appoints his trustees and executors, the investments in question, i.e., the Consols and the Government New 3 per cent. stock, on trust to make certain payments which I do not think are material for the present purpose:

"And as to the rest residue and remainder of the said Government Consols and New 3 per cent. stock Upon trust that the said trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will shall divide the same or consider the same to be divided into as many equal parts or shares as there shall be daughters of mine living at my death and shall appropriate one of such parts or shares or consider and treat the same as appropriated to each such daughter of mine living at my death and shall stand possessed of the part or share appropriated or to be treated as appropriated to any daughter of mine in the same premises (hereinafter for brevity referred to as the share of such daughter) . . .”

- A Then follow beneficial trusts which begin with provisions applicable during the minority of any daughter concerning maintenance, the accumulation of surplus income, and so forth. The testator proceeds to give to each daughter who should have attained the age of twenty-one years and should for the time being be unmarried or should have married or should marry whether before
- B or after attaining the age of twenty years with his consent during his life or with the consent of the trustees after his death a life interest in the income of such daughter's share and after her death the share is to be held in trust for the daughter's issue as she shall appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for her children at 21, or, in the case of daughters, on marrying under that age, and, if more than one, in equal shares. There is the usual proviso
- C for hotchpot, and there is a power of advancement, and then there is this provision in the event of the failure of the trusts of a daughter's share :

“ Provided always and I declare that if with regard to any such daughter of mine as aforesaid there shall be no child of such daughter living at my death or born afterwards and who being a son shall attain the age of twenty one . . .”

- D that is to say, failure of the trusts in default of appointment to which I have already referred, the trustees are to pay the income of the daughter's share to any surviving husband. Nothing turns on that in the events which have happened. Subject to the husband's life interest, there is this provision :

- E “ Subject to such trust in favour of her husband if any the share of such daughter and the interest dividends and income thereof or so much thereof as shall not have become vested or have been applied under any of the trusts or powers of this my will shall go over and be added by way of accruer to the shares of the daughters of mine if any who shall at the time of the death of such daughter not have been married with such consent as aforesaid and if more than one such share shall be added in equal
- F portions or subdivisions to and between or among such respective shares and every addition to any such share by way of accruer as aforesaid shall after the accruer thereof be blended with and thenceforth form part of and follow the destination of the share to which the same shall be so added Provided always and I hereby declare that in the case of any of my said daughters who shall die without having been married with such consent
- G as aforesaid the share of the one so dying if only one or the shares both original and accruing of the survivor of them so dying if more than one shall subject and without prejudice to the trusts hereinbefore declared and after the death of such one or of such survivor as the case may be go remain and be held upon trust for my said three sons their executors administrators and assigns in equal shares as tenants in common.”

- H There follows this proviso regarding marriage without the testator's consent :

“ Provided always and I hereby declare that if any daughter of mine shall being a spinster marry without my consent during my lifetime or after my death without the consent of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will then and in any such case the share which any such daughter would otherwise have taken shall go over and devolve as the same would have devolved by virtue of this my will had such daughter died after my death without having been married.”

There are powers of investment, with which I need not trouble, and then there is a residuary gift, the character of which as a true residuary gift has been called in question before me :

"And as to the furniture goods and chattels in my house in Stephen's Green Dublin and all the rest residue and remainder of my goods chattels and effects whatsoever I bequeath the same to John Alfred French of St. Jane's Terrace Clonskeagh George West Frazer of No. 77 Wellington Road and John Clarke Powell of Sandymount in the county of Dublin whom I hereby appoint guardians of the persons and fortunes of my minor children to be applied by them according to their discretion and as they may consider most for the benefit of my said eight daughters hereinbefore named."

The two codicils are not directly material. There was a provision with respect to the testator's daughter, Emily, in the first codicil, apparently made by the testator in consequence of some difference of opinion with her to the effect that in certain circumstances the trustees might cause the whole or some part of the benefit receivable by Emily under the will to go to the testator's other daughters in the same way as their own shares as provided by the will. There is a reference, therefore, to the other daughters' "own shares." In the second codicil there is a reference to certain payments which the testator had made by way of financing a visit to Australia by two of his daughters, and he provided with respect to the advances so made that the trustees should deduct them "out of such sum as may be coming to each" of the named daughters "out of the bequests so made to them." That is a rather obscure provision, because there is no previous reference in the codicil to the provision for these two named daughters to which the expression "the bequests so made to them" can be referred, but the passage is called in aid along with the reference to the daughter's own share in the previous codicil as throwing light on the character of the gift given to the two daughters by the will, and as supporting the contention that this is one of those cases in which the testator has given absolute interests and engrafted trusts on them, in which case, if the trusts do not exhaust the entire beneficial interests in the events which have happened, the initial absolute gift remains and takes effect in accordance with the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1) and Hancock v. Watson (2).

The first question I must endeavour to answer is: What has happened to Mrs. Amy Lipscomb's share on her death without issue on Oct. 31, 1945? The competing views which have been argued before me are, first, that there was no trust applicable to her share in the events which have happened, with the result that under the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1), there being, according to this argument, an initial absolute gift to her, her estate takes under the initial absolute gift which ex hypothesi has not been effectively cut down or taken away by the engrafted trusts. Another view is, not only that there is no declared trust applicable in the events which have happened, but, further, there is no sufficient indication of an initial absolute gift in this will to make the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1) applicable, with the result that the share passes under the residuary gift. A further view is to the same effect as to the failure of the declared trusts and the absence of anything amounting to an initial absolute gift, but adduces as a consequence that there must be an intestacy of the testator with reference to the share in question because it is said that what I have referred to as the residuary gift is not a true residuary gift, or, alternatively, in the events which happened there was no one to take under it. Finally, it is said that the trusts declared of a daughter's share do, in the events which happened, exhaust the whole beneficial interest in Mrs. Lipscomb's share. It is said that, if the ultimate trust as declared by the testator is properly construed, it will be found that, in the events which happened, Mrs. Lipscomb's share is carried over to the estate of the testator's three younger sons. Those are the questions with respect to Mrs. Lipscomb's share, and substantially the same questions arise with regard to Mrs. Greeves' share.

The difficulty seems to have been occasioned by the distinction the testator made between his married and his unmarried daughters. It will be remembered that, on the failure of the trusts in favour of the children or remoter issue of a daughter, the share is to " . . . go over and be added by way of accruer to the shares of the daughters of mine if any who shall at the time of the death of such daughter not have been married with such consent as aforesaid . . . "

The effect of those words " who shall at the time of the death of such daughter not have been married with such consent as aforesaid " obviously excludes the share of any daughter who has married, so that Mrs. Lipscomb's share could not go over to the share of the one surviving daughter, Mrs. Greeves, because Mrs. Greeves, being a daughter who had married with the requisite consent, is excluded by definition from the accruer clause. In the ordinarily drawn will one would have expected, in default of issue, a simple accruer which would have ultimately carried the fund to the last survivor of the daughters. If, in the events which happened, there had, in fact, been an unmarried daughter surviving Mrs. Lipscomb, or, in the case of Mrs. Greeves, surviving Mrs. Greeves, it would not, I think, have been disputed by anyone that the shares now in question would have gone over to the share of such surviving unmarried daughter, and on the subsequent death of the unmarried daughter her share, original and accruing, would have gone to the estate of the three sons, but, unfortunately, events were not so obliging, and, as I have already stated, at the respective deaths of these two married daughters all the unmarried daughters were already dead.

It has been argued that in those circumstances the accruer clause is incapable of being applied. It is said that it is limited in its operation to shares of daughters of the testator who shall, at the time of the death of the daughter whose share is being dealt with not only " not have been married with such consent as aforesaid," but who shall furthermore be living at the time of the death of such daughter. It is said that by necessary implication personal survivorship is imported into this accruer clause as a condition of participating in the accruer. If that view is right, then, as all the unmarried daughters were already dead, the accruer clause could not apply. The trusts declared by the testator would not, in the events which have happened, have exhausted the whole beneficial interest, and the destination of the fund in each case, that is to say, of the share of each of these two daughters would depend on the application or otherwise of the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1), and failing its application, on the construction and effect of the so-called residuary gift, the question in the latter case being whether the shares passed under the residuary gift, or were not disposed of at all by the testator and passed as on an intestacy.

Is there any real justification as a matter of construction for confining the accruer to shares of daughters living at the date of accruer in addition to being daughters who have not at that date " been married with such consent " ? In my judgment, there is, as a matter of construction, really no justification for so limiting it. It should be noted that the accruer is expressed to be " to the shares of the daughters," not to the daughters. If the accruer had been expressed to be to the daughters as opposed to their shares, that would have been a point in favour of the view that personal survivorship was required, but it is " to the shares of the daughters," and one must remember that by definition that means the shares appropriated, or to be treated as appropriated, under the preceding provisions of the testator's will to the daughters in question. The existence of those shares, it seems to me, does not depend on the survivor.

ship of the daughters, nor does it seem to me that a daughter who has never married ceases to come within the definition of a daughter who shall not have "married with such consent as aforesaid" because she has died. On her death, no doubt, the possibility of her ever marrying with consent or otherwise comes to an end, but she still is quite properly described as a daughter who has not been "married with such consent as aforesaid." I, therefore, find myself unable to read this accruer clause as operating only in favour of the shares of unmarried daughters who are living at the date of accruer. I suggested in the course of the argument by way of illustration the converse case. Supposing the accruer had been "to the shares of the daughters of mine if any who shall at the time of the death of such daughter have been married with such consent as aforesaid." It seems to me that that would clearly have included a daughter who had married with the requisite consent and who had died before the date of the accruer. To hold the contrary in that hypothetical case might very well have had the effect of depriving children of the deceased married daughter of any share in the accruer merely by the accidental event of the failure of their mother to survive. Grammatically I see no more reason for importing the condition of survivorship into the qualification "not have been married with such consent as aforesaid" than there would have been in the converse qualification "have been married with such consent as aforesaid."

I am fortified in the conclusion to which I have come by the consideration that, quite plainly, the testator contemplated that, subject to provision being made for his daughters and their children, if any, the fund should ultimately go to the three sons or their respective estates. One can imagine events in which that intention might have been defeated. He does not seem to have contemplated the possibility of all his daughters marrying and all or some of them having no children. He appears to have assumed that there would be some daughter or daughters of his who would be unmarried. With that qualification, I think it is fair to say that he did contemplate that, ultimately, subject to the provisions he had made in favour of his daughters and their children, the estates of the three sons would take the corpus of the fund. The construction I have adopted accords, therefore, with what seems to have been clearly the scheme of the will. The contrary construction produces what, in my judgment, would be a capricious result, in that it would make the destination of the capital of the fund dependent on the accident of survivorship of at least one unmarried daughter of the testator at the date of the accruer. It seems to me that is a result which one should hesitate to produce unless the language of the will constrains one to do so.

For these reasons, the conclusion to which I have come, on the true construction of the will, is that on the respective deaths of Mrs. Lipcomb and Mrs. Greeves their shares, including accrued shares, if any, accrued in equal shares to the shares of the unmarried daughters of the testator, the share so accruing in each case being held on the same trusts as and following the destination of such unmarried daughters' original share. The effect of such a declaration, I apprehend, will be, so far as the corpus of the fund is concerned, to carry it in equal shares to the estates of the three sons. The conclusion to which I have come on this question of construction makes it unnecessary for me to express any view on the interesting questions which have been debated before me as to the application or otherwise of the rule in Lassence v. Tierney (1), in the event of the shares not being fully disposed of by the trusts, or the other interesting question as to the scope and effect of the residuary gift in this will which, it will be remembered, was somewhat curiously expressed as to its subject-matter and contained no gift to anyone except such gift as was to be implied or discretion conferred on certain named persons to apply the residue "according to their discretion and as they may consider most for the benefit of my said eight daughters hereinbefore named."

As neither of those interesting questions are material, in the view I have formed on the construction of the accruer clause in the will I will not indulge in the expression of any superfluous views about them.

Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client out of the fund.

Solicitors: Rowe & Maw (for the plaintiff); Rowe & Maw, agents for Llewellyn & Hann, Cardiff (for the first defendant); Rowe & Maw, agents for Carson, Baillie, Johnston & Thom, Belfast (for the third and fourth defendants); Radford, Frankland & Mercer, agents for Stanley Evans, Manchester (for the second defendant).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re JEEVES (deceased). MORRIS-WILLIAMS AND ANOTHER v. HAYLETT AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), November 10, 1948.]

Will—Division of fund—Per stirpes or per capita—Division “equally between daughters of S. de V. and to E.M.W.”

By her will, a testatrix declared that her residuary estate was to be divided “unto and equally between the daughters of my late brother S. de V. who are resident in America and who shall be living at the time of my decease and to Edith M.W. the daughter of my sister Sarah O.” In the event of any of her nieces dying in her lifetime her issue was to take per stirpes “and if more than one equally between them the shares of my residuary estate which such deceased niece would have taken had she survived me and attained a vested interest.” Her niece, Edith, died during the lifetime of the testatrix leaving three children.

HELD: the three children of Edith were to take a moiety of the estate in equal shares and the five children of the brother were to take the other moiety in equal shares.

Dictum of SARGANT, J., in Re Harper ([1914] 1 Ch. 76; 109 L.T. 927), applied.

[AS TO DISTRIBUTION PER CAPITA AND PER STIRPES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 356-359, paras. 402-405; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 991-1003, Nos. 8490-8605.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Harper, Plowman v. Harper, [1914] 1 Ch. 70; 83 L.J.Ch. 157; 109 L.T. 925; 44 Digest 845, 6985.
- (2) Re Walbran, Milner v. Walbran, [1906] 1 Ch. 64; 93 L.T. 745; 44 Digest 845, 6984.
- (3) Re Prosser, Prosser v. Griffith, (1929), 167 L.T. Jo. 307; [1929] W.N. 85; Digest Supp.
- (4) Re Cossentine, Philp v. Wesleyan Methodist Local Preachers' Mutual Aid Asscn. Trustees, [1933] Ch. 119; 102 L.J.Ch. 78; 148 L.T. 261; Digest Supp.
- (5) Re Alcock, [1945] 1 All E.R. 613; [1945] Ch. 264; 114 L.J.Ch. 161; 173 L.T. 4; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (6) Re Daniel, Jones v. Michael, [1945] 2 All E.R. 101; 173 L.T. 315; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (7) Re Hall, Parker v. Knight, [1948] Ch. 437; [1948] L.J.R. 1430.
- (8) Re Jeffrey, Welch v. Jeffrey, [1948] 2 All E.R. 131.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS taken out by the personal representatives of the testatrix to determine whether, on the true construction of the will, the residuary estate of the testatrix was divisible in equal moieties or whether it was divisible into sixths. VAISEY, J., decided it was divisible in equal moieties.

Wigan for the plaintiffs (personal representatives under the will).

J. A. Wolfe for the daughters of Edith Morris-Williams.

Elverston for the daughters of the brother.

VAISEY, J.: This case raises a question of a familiar kind, and the answer to it is not very easy to give. The testatrix, Alice Mary Jeeves, who was a widow, made her will on Sept. 9, 1940. She died on Apr. 23, 1948. She gave her whole estate in trust for sale and conversion on the usual terms, and, after providing for the payment out of the proceeds of her testamentary expenses and debts and what she called the legacies bequeathed by her will, she declared that the remainder of her residuary estate was to be held as described in cl. 5 of her will, which is in these terms:

"My trustees shall pay and divide the remainder of my residuary estate unto and equally between the daughters of my late brother Samuel de Vall who are resident in America and who shall be living at the time of my decease and to Edith Martha Morris-Williams the daughter of my sister Sarah Margaret Owens provided that if any of my said nieces shall have died in my lifetime . . . leaving issue living at the date of my decease who being male attain the age of 21 years or being female attain that age or marry such issue shall take per stirpes and if more than one equally between them the shares of my residuary estate which such deceased niece would have taken had she survived me and attained a vested interest."

That proviso is not very accurately expressed, but its operation in the events which have happened is clear.

The niece, Edith Martha Morris-Williams, predeceased the testatrix, leaving her surviving three children all of whom have attained 21 and are parties to the present application. There is no doubt that they take the share, whatever it may be, of their mother under the proviso to cl. 5 of the will. The brother of the testatrix, Samuel de Vall, had five children, all of whom survived the testatrix and are still living. They are all of them daughters and all of them defendants to the summons. The question is whether, according to the true construction of the will, the residuary estate of the testatrix is now divisible in equal moieties, one moiety being in trust for the five daughters of Samuel de Vall in equal shares and the other moiety in trust for the daughters of Edith Martha Morris-Williams in equal shares or whether the residuary estate is divisible into sixths, one-sixth part being held in trust for each of the five children of Samuel de Vall and the remaining one-sixth in trust for the daughters of Edith Martha Morris-Williams in equal shares. Between those two possible modes of division I have to decide.

Counsel have referred me to a large number of authorities, and I confess that, whether they are reconcilable or not, they do not, either collectively or singly, give me any sure guidance to a solution of the present problem. One proposition emerges from their combined effect and from the observations of the learned judges by whom they were decided, and that is that there is undoubtedly a prima facie rule that where there is a direction to divide, at any rate among persons of the same generation or standing in the same degree of relationship to the testatrix, the division is to be an equal division, that is to say, a division between the various beneficiaries per capita. In the present case there is undoubtedly some ground for saying that the testatrix was considering her nieces not as individuals but, if I may say so, by households. She puts the daughters of her brother into one household and the daughter of her sister into another. I do not feel that it would be capricious or unreasonable for her to say, if she did say it, that half her estate should go to her brother's daughters and the other half should go to her sister's daughter. Nor, indeed, is there anything capricious in the other view, which is that she wished to benefit all her nieces without distinction and without regard to whether they were children of her brother or of her sister.

I find myself in great doubt whether it is possible for me to discover with certitude which of the two views is that which the testatrix must be considered to have intended. I adopt the words of SARGANT, J., in Re Harper (1) where he says ([1914] 1 Ch. 76): "Decisions in cases of this kind are necessarily rather in the nature of guesswork." The only comment I would make on that observation is that I do not think the word "rather" is wholly appropriate. These cases are almost always essentially and inevitably cases in which guesswork has to be employed in arriving at a proper solution of the difficulty. In addition to that case I have been referred to Re Walbran (2) a case decided by CLAUSON, J., Re Prosser (3), Re Cossentine (4), a decision of MAUGHAM, J., Re Alcock (5), a decision of EVERSHEED, J., a decision of mine in Re Daniel (6), Re Hall (7), and, finally, Re Jeffrey (8). From those cases I get some, but not a great deal of, assistance beyond the fact that there is, undoubtedly, a prima facie presumption that a division between persons of the same generation or standing in the same relationship to a testatrix ought to be a division per capita.

Turning back to the will, it seems to me that the arrangement of the words is somewhat inapt. The direction is for the payment and division of the residue unto and equally between the brother's daughters and to the sister's daughter. I have felt a great deal of doubt whether any word of equality of division is to be found in the sentence which applies to the sister's daughter at all. I think the words, grammatically read, are equivalent to a direction to divide the estate unto the brother's daughters equally and to the sister's daughter. Undoubtedly, to my mind, that indicates a stirpital division between the brother's daughters, they taking one half equally between them, and the sister's daughter taking the other half. I believe that the real problem before me now is to decide whether that is sufficient to displace the ordinary rule of a per capita division. It is easy, in my judgment, to say on this will that neither view could be rightly described as capricious. It may well be that the testatrix wished to benefit stocks of which the praepositi, if that is the correct word, were the brother and sister. It is equally likely that she regarded all her nieces with equal affection and with an equal claim on her bounty. A very close scrutiny of the words might result in there being enough in this will to favour the former of the two views, but I am not convinced that that way of looking at this kind of clause is very helpful and I take the view that it is pre-eminently a case of what SARGANT, J., described as guesswork. So treating it, I think, on the whole, that the curious collocation of words which appears to predicate equality only in relation to the children of the brother is sufficient to indicate that the testatrix was thinking about her nieces, not as individuals, but as households.

I propose to declare that the three children of Edith, niece of the testatrix, take a moiety of the residuary estate equally between them, and the five daughters of the brother take the other moiety of the estate in equal shares. I confess that I have come to this conclusion with a great deal of hesitation, but, as I am convinced that it is a matter of guesswork and equally that it is my duty to guess as best I can, I have formed a view. The costs of all parties as between solicitor and client will be taxed and paid out of the estate of the testatrix in due course of administration.

Costs as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate.

Solicitors: Pontifex, Pitt & Co., agents for Levick & Salwey, Leominster (for the plaintiff); Rowe & Maw (for the defendant); Churchill, Clapham & Co., agents for H. Vaughan Vaughan & Co., Builth (for the first defendant).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

R. v. JONES.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Humphreys, Lewis and Jones, JJ.), October 25, November 2, 1948.]

Criminal Law—Accessory after the fact—Direction to jury—Specification of acts alleged to have been done to assist the felon Statement made to avoid arrest on other charge.

The appellant, who had been acquitted on a number of counts charging him, with his wife and another person, of receiving stolen goods, was convicted of being an accessory after the fact to those offences of which the wife had been found guilty. The only evidence against the appellant on these charges consisted of his words and actions when the police visited his house. The assistant recorder, in his summing-up, gave the following direction to the jury on the charges of being an accessory after the fact: "An accessory after the fact is one who, knowing that another person has been guilty of felony, takes some active step to conceal the felony and to prevent the apprehension of the principal felon, and, if it is material, you will have to consider whether Jones' conduct was that of a man taking active steps to conceal a felony committed by Mrs. Jones, assuming, of course, that you think Mrs. Jones was guilty of receiving." No further reference was made to the charges of being an accessory.

HELD: it was essential that the assistant recorder should have specified the act or acts alleged to have been done by the appellant for the purpose of assisting his wife to escape conviction, and to have pointed out to the jury that, since he was also charged with the offence of receiving, his evasions and untruths may have been due to his anxiety to avoid arrest quite apart from any desire to protect his wife.

Direction to jury in R. v. Levy ([1912] 1 K.B. 159; 106 L.T. 192) approved.

[AS TO ACCESSORIES AFTER THE FACT, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 36, 37, para. 35; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 14, pp. 99, 100, Nos. 714-728.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Levy, [1912] 1 K.B. 158; 81 L.J.K.B. 264; 106 L.T. 192; 76 J.P. 123; 14 Digest 100, 717.
- (2) R. v. Hansill, (1849), 13 J.P. 556; 3 Cox, C.C. 597; 14 Digest 100, 719.
- (3) R. v. Rowley, [1948] 1 All E.R. 570; 112 J.P. 207.
- (4) R. v. Aberg, [1948] 1 All E.R. 601; [1948] 2 K.B. 173; 112 J.P. 206.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was acquitted at Birmingham Quarter Sessions on nine charges of receiving stolen goods, but he was found Guilty of being an accessory after the fact to such felonies as the jury found were proved against his wife. His appeal, which was based on the grounds of misdirection by the assistant recorder, was allowed and his conviction was quashed. The facts appear in the judgment of the court.

Silverman for the appellant.

A. E. James for the Crown.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2. HUMPHREYS, J., read the judgment of the court. The appellant appeals from his conviction by leave of the court. He was indicted at the quarter sessions for the city of Birmingham. The indictment charged him in a number of counts together with his wife, Elsie Jones, and a third party named, Twist, with feloniously receiving a number of ladies' dresses, coats and similar articles proved to have been stolen between November, 1947, and May, 1948. Elsie Jones and Twist were convicted on some of those charges.

and do not appeal. The appellant was acquitted on all the counts against him charging receiving, but he was convicted on six counts as an accessory after the fact to such felonies as the jury found were proved against his wife. The counts were all in the same form, and each alleged that he was an accessory after the fact to receiving stolen goods in that he, well knowing that Elsie Jones had received certain property mentioned knowing it to be stolen, did, between the date of that receiving and on dates thereafter, receive, comfort, harbour, assist and maintain the said Elsie Jones. The dates alleged for the receiving varied according to the dates between which the prosecution alleged the goods to have been stolen. None of the counts, therefore, indicated any particular date as the date of the offence charged.

The appellant lived with his wife and daughter at 7, Upper Grove Street, Sinethwick, a house containing several rooms, apparently all occupied by the appellant, his wife and daughter. On May 9, 1948, the police found at that house in the living room downstairs, twenty-five ladies' coats and dresses on coat hangers attached to the picture rails, all new and nearly all bearing price tickets and labels. In the bedroom occupied by the appellant and his wife they found a considerable amount of similar goods, and, further, in every room in the house except the daughter's bedroom still other articles all subsequently identified as being stolen. There was no evidence that the appellant had been concerned in the buying, selling, or otherwise dealing in any of the stolen articles, and the appellant and his wife both gave evidence that the business carried on there was the business of the wife and that the appellant had nothing to do with it. In fact, the sole evidence against the appellant on the charges of which he was convicted consisted of what he said and did on the occasion of the police visit to his house on May 9.

As to his actions, it is right to say that the detective inspector agreed that the appellant made no attempt to prevent the police from searching the house. As to his words, the evidence of Detective Inspector Quinton so far as material, was to the following effect. He said that he went to the house on May 9. (Q) Is that a house occupied by the two prisoners Jones? (A) Yes. (Q) Will you describe the sort of house it is? (A) It is a rather large, old fashioned type of dwelling. There is an archway which leads to a garden and yard at the back, and the front door is from the archway. (Q) When you went there first at 8 o'clock did you find they were both out? (A) Yes. (Q) At 8.20 p.m. did James Leonard Jones arrive at the premises? (A) Yes. (Q) Did you speak to him? (A) I said to him: 'We are police officers. We have reason to believe you have a number of ladies' coats and dresses in the house and that they are stolen property.' (Q) What did he reply? (A) There is nothing here. (Q) What did you say to that? (A) Have you any new clothing here at all? (Q) And his reply? (A) He said 'No.' I then told him: 'I am not satisfied; I am going to search the house.' (Q) What did Jones say then? (A) 'Well, my wife did buy three coats, but I do not know where she has put them. Perhaps my daughter will know,' and he called his daughter who was in the front room." A little later, the inspector said that he found certain books and articles, and the question was put: "(Q) Did you then speak to Jones again about what you had found? (A) Yes. (Q) What did you say? (A) I said to him: 'Are there any more,' and I cautioned him then. He said: 'They are all in this room and there is nothing else in the house'." The inspector went on to say that he, not being satisfied, continued to search and went into the front room upstairs in spite of that denial. There he found nine more ladies' coats and three dresses, again all new and bearing price tickets, which were part of the property identified as having been stolen. Then he was asked: "(Q) What did Jones say about them?" (A) He said: 'These are my wife's and daughter's; they have had them a long time.' I told him the price tickets were still attached and he did not reply to that.'

The assistant recorder, who tried the case, left to the jury the receiving counts, directing them that it was open to them to find on the evidence that the stolen property was in the joint possession of husband and wife, and there was, in our opinion, ample material on which the jury could find that the appellant was well aware that the articles were stolen. Indeed, it may well be that the jury would have convicted the appellant on those charges if they had not been afforded an opportunity of finding him guilty of what they probably regarded as the minor offence of having assisted his wife throughout in her felonious dealings. In his summing-up the learned assistant recorder, after dealing with the evidence upon the receiving charges, proceeded as follows :

" Assuming that you are not satisfied as to all or any of the charges of receiving, that the property ever came into Jones' possession, you will then have to consider the remaining counts in the indictment against him, that is to say, counts 12 to 20 in which he is charged with what is known as being an accessory after the fact. An accessory after the fact is one who, knowing that another person has been guilty of felony, takes some active step to conceal the felony and to prevent the apprehension of the principal felon, and, if it is material, you will have to consider whether Jones' conduct was that of a man taking active steps to conceal a felony committed by Mrs. Jones, assuming, of course, that you think Mrs. Jones was guilty of receiving. So much as to the position generally, and you will have the indictment before you and you will have to consider each charge separately. I come now to deal with the evidence."

That was all. No further reference was made throughout the summing-up to the charges of being an accessory after the fact. That direction left the jury entirely without guidance as to what " active steps " (to use the language of the assistant recorder) by a husband will bring him within the criminal law, or what steps were relied on by the prosecution and what was the significance of the evidence with regard to them. There was, in our view, another serious omission from the summing-up in that the learned judge failed to point out to the jury that on May 9 the appellant was being questioned by the police as a suspect liable, as he knew, to be charged himself with felonious receiving, as, indeed, he was, so that it was for the jury to consider whether his evasions and untruths may not have been due to his anxiety to avoid arrest, quite apart from any consideration of his wife and her position.

The direction to a jury approved by this court in R. v. Levy (1) was as follows ([1912] 1 K.B. 159) :

" . . . if they were satisfied that she removed the things mentioned from Green's workshop, knowing that he was guilty of committing the felony charged against him, and did so for the purpose of assisting him to escape conviction, they should find her guilty."

In our view, it was essential in the present case that the learned judge should specify the act or acts alleged to have been done by the appellant for the purpose of assisting his wife to escape conviction, and, further, should direct the jury specifically that, if the motive in the mind of the appellant was merely a desire to avoid his own arrest, that would not be sufficient to bring him within the purview of this charge. There are offences couched in such plain terms that nothing more is required than a statement of the offence to enable a jury to say whether the evidence is sufficient to convict, but this charge of being an accessory after the fact is not one, and, in our opinion, calls for a reasoned direction to ensure that no injustice is done to the accused person. The absence of any explanation to the jury on the matters referred to rendered the summing-up in the peculiar circumstances of the case defective to such an extent as to make the trial unsatisfactory. Without saying that there was no evidence on which the appellant could be convicted, the evidence properly considered was, in our opinion, very slight and called for a much more detailed examination than it received at the hands of the learned assistant recorder.

Two other points were taken by counsel for the appellant. The first relates to the fact that advantage was taken by the prosecution of the terms of the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 43 (b), to prove in the course of the trial a previous conviction against the appellant of factory-breaking with intent to steal. This evidence was receivable for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge on the charges of receiving. There was no specific direction to the jury that they must disregard it when considering the charge of being an accessory. It would certainly have been better that the jury should be so directed, but as they acquitted the appellant on the receiving counts to which it specifically related, we think it unlikely that it affected their minds on the other counts.

The other matter is that, in speaking of the question of possession by the then accused person, Jones, the present appellant, the learned assistant recorder said this :

“ You will have to consider as to the property generally whether this came into the possession of Jones, that would be in the joint possession of Jones and his wife, and whether at that time he knew that this was stolen property. That relates to the property generally, but there is one special matter which affects him, and you will remember that the wife, Mrs. Jones, told the detectives that he could recover some of the stolen property and that subsequently some of these articles in question were produced by Jones and handed over to the detectives. All matters of fact are for you, but it seems to me that with regard to that particular property you can have little doubt that it came into the possession of Jones when he received it and took it to the detectives. Whether he knew at the time that it was stolen property, of course is another matter.”

That passage, as it appears in the transcript, is so glaring a misdirection that we feel it is doubtful whether some mistake in copying or possibly in mishearing may not have been made, but assuming that the words were used, it is true, as pointed out by counsel for the Crown, that the learned assistant recorder was dealing with the question of possession as part of the case for the prosecution on the receiving counts. That the direction was wrong and seriously prejudicial to the appellant was admitted by counsel for the Crown, but he argues that it could only have affected the minds of the jury on those counts upon which the appellant was acquitted. Whether the court would have thought it right to act upon either of these unfortunate slips in the summing-up if they stood alone, we need not decide, but they do tend to strengthen the view that this conviction is most unsatisfactory and cannot be upheld. The appeal is allowed and the conviction quashed.

Conviction quashed.

Solicitors : Arthur Hall-Wright & Son, Birmingham (for the appellant) ;
M. P. Pugh, Birmingham (for the Crown).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WRAGG v. LOVETT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Evershed, L.J.J.), October 15, 18, 19, November 11, 1948.]

Agency—Estate agent—Authority to sell at stated price—Authority to make particular contract.

The defendant (the vendor) authorised W. & Co., a firm of estate agents, to sell his freehold dwelling-house to the plaintiff (the purchaser) for £840. The agents made the following agreement in writing as agents for the defendant: "Memorandum of agreement made this 29th day of June, 1946, between Mr. E.C.L., 349A, D. Rd., Norwich, retired, the vendor, to Mr. E.H.W., 27, L. Rd., Lower Hellesdon, the purchaser, Whereby the vendor hereby agrees to sell and the purchaser agrees to purchase the freehold semi-detached house situate and known as No. 27, L. Rd., Lower Hellesdon, at the price of £840, the purchase to be made and completed according to the National Conditions of Sale (latest edition) so far as the same are applicable to a sale by private treaty and are not inconsistent with the conditions following: (1) The deposit shall be £84 of the purchase money and shall be paid to Messrs. C.D.W. & Co., 2/4, V. St., Norwich, estate agents, as agents for the vendor. (2) The day for completion of the purchase shall be July 20, 1946, or earlier by arrangement. (3) The vendor sells as beneficial owner. (4) The title shall commence with a document forming a good root of title dated at least 20 years ago and the property is sold subject to any covenants or stipulations contained or referred to in the deeds. In an action by the purchaser for specific performance of this agreement the defendant pleaded inter alia that W. & Co. had only authority to make an open contract.

HELD: on the facts, that the defendant was satisfied to allow W. & Co. to make whatever contract they thought best, and so they had authority to make the contract.

Per curiam: when a vendor merely authorises a house agent to sell at a stated price he must not be taken to be authorising the agent to do more than agree the price with an intending purchaser. The making of a contract is no part of an estate agents' business, and, although, on the facts of an individual case, the principal may authorise him to make a contract, such an authorisation is not lightly to be inferred from vague or ambiguous language.

[AS TO IMPLIED AUTHORITY OF ESTATE AGENTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 1, p. 220, para. 380; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 1, pp. 377-379, Nos. 831-836.]

Case referred to:

- (1) Keen v. Mear, [1920] 2 Ch. 574; 89 L.J.Ch. 513; 124 L.T. 19; 12 Digest 156, 1102.

APPEAL by the defendant from a judgment of JENKINS, J., dated Dec. 3, 1947, ordering specific performance of a written agreement made between the plaintiff and a firm of estate agents acting for the defendant in the sale of the defendant's dwelling-house. The defendant pleaded that he was induced to enter into the agreement by misrepresentation and that he did not authorise the agents to make the agreement for him. His LORDSHIP held that there was no misrepresentation and that the estate agent was authorised to make a contract containing terms not less favourable to a vendor than those of an open contract. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Lightman for the defendant.

Boraston for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 11. LORD GREENE, M.R., read the following judgment of the Court. The question which arises for decision is whether or not a contract binding on

- the defendant was ever made, and this depends on the answers to the questions : Did the defendant authorise the house agents, Ward & Co., to make the contract alleged, or, if he did not, did he authorise his solicitor, Mr. Hatch, to ratify the contract on his behalf ? The judge had the difficult task of extracting the relevant facts from the evidence of witnesses, one of whom, the defendant, obviously had difficulty not only in hearing, but also in understanding the questions put to him, and was also the possessor of a wholly unreliable memory. Another witness, Mr. Hatch, also had a memory on which he himself could place no reliance, while the defendant's daughter, who dealt with the agents on behalf of the defendant, naturally lacked any precise appreciation of what she was expected to say to them. In these circumstances, the learned judge, who saw the witnesses, was in the best position to form an opinion as to the conclusions of fact to be drawn from what was necessarily unsatisfactory evidence. He clearly took the view that Mrs. Martin, the partner in Ward & Co., who was concerned in the business, was entitled to accept what was said to her as being an authorisation, not merely to agree the single term of price, but also to enter into a binding contract on behalf of the defendant. We find no ground for differing from this conclusion of the learned judge.
- It is, moreover, in our view, the only conclusion consistent with the subsequent attitude of the defendant himself. It was not until late in the history of the dispute that the point of lack of authority was taken on behalf of the defendant. Previously to this his only complaint was, not that Ward & Co. had purported to bind him by a contract when he had never authorised them to make a contract on his behalf, but that the contract which they had made did not contain what he thought of as a condition to be inserted in the contract, namely, that the plaintiff would continue to reside in the house at Norwich. We may say in passing that the learned judge found that the instructions given to Mrs. Martin meant and were understood by her to mean not that such a condition should be inserted in the contract, but that she should obtain from the plaintiff an assurance as to his intention. The allegation that such an assurance was given was the foundation of that branch of the defendant's case which was based on misrepresentation. The view taken by the learned judge obtains further confirmation from the letter of Aug. 2, 1946, from Messrs. Hatch & Hatch to Messrs. Mills & Reeve. As to this letter Mr. Hatch said : " No doubt I had his instructions or authorisation to write this letter, so far as I know." Later answers by him may, no doubt, be read as intended to modify this particular answer, but assuming that Mr. Hatch did not adopt the natural and proper course of taking specific instructions from his client, it seems clear that, as a result of long usage, he regarded the fact as immaterial. The letter, be it observed, does not dispute, on the contrary it asserts, that a contract had been made, and the sole ground suggested for impugning its binding character lay in the alleged misrepresentation.
- While accepting the learned judge's conclusion upon the particular facts of this case, we must not be understood as suggesting that when a vendor merely authorises a house agent to " sell " at a stated price he must be taken to be authorising the agent to do more than agree with an intending purchaser the essential (and, generally, the most essential) term, i.e., the price. The making of a contract is no part of an estate agent's business, and, although, on the facts of an individual case, the person who employs him may authorise him to make a contract, such an authorisation is not lightly to be inferred from vague or ambiguous language. But there remains the question whether or not Ward & Co. were authorised (or, what in law is the same thing, reasonably understood themselves to be authorised) to make this particular contract. It was held by RUSSELL, J., in Keen v. Mear (1) that, on the facts of that case, the only authority given to the agent was to make an open contract. In the present case, the learned judge understood that decision as not excluding the making of a contract containing terms not less favourable to the vendor than those of an open contract. It is not, in our view, necessary to express a concluded opinion upon this question. We may, however, point out (i) that the words of RUSSELL, J. ([1920] 2 Ch. 579):

"But had he authority to sign the particular contract here in question? I think not. It contains a special condition as to title, which might or might not be less favourable to a vendor than the title required under an open contract" suggests to our minds that he meant to limit the authorisation in such a case to an authorisation to make an open contract and to exclude a consideration whether a term inappropriate to an open contract was or was not more beneficial to the vendor; (ii) that an open contract is a thing certain, whereas the question whether or not a particular stipulation is more or less beneficial to the vendor may, in the complications of English conveyancing, be a question of great difficulty which could only be resolved by litigation; and (iii) we are not clear that the special provision as to the date of completion was, in fact, more beneficial to the vendor than would have been the corresponding provision under an open contract. To say that a simple authority to make a contract allows a house agent to insert any terms he pleases provided they are ultimately held to be more beneficial to the vendor appears to us to be a proposition which requires careful examination.

In the present case, we do not think it necessary to decide this matter. It appears to us that the proper inference from all the facts of the case is that the defendant was satisfied to allow his agents to make whatever contract they thought best and relied on them to protect his interests provided, and provided only, that they obtained the desired statement from the plaintiff as to his intention to remain in the house. Mrs. Martin so interpreted her instructions. The action which she took did not appear to Mr. Hatch himself as being in the least unusual or improper, but what appears to us to be most important is that the defendant not only did not question the authority of Ward & Co. to make a contract for him, but his solicitor either was or conceived himself to be authorised to write the letter of Aug. 3 in which he expressly asserted the making of a contract. It may be perfectly true that the defendant had not seen the contract and was ignorant as to its terms, but this appears to us to be immaterial on the facts of this case. If, as we think, he must be taken to have left it to his agents to make such a contract as they thought proper in his interests, the fact that he did not see the contract would be immaterial. Moreover, the fact that before Mr. Hatch wrote the letter of Aug. 2 the defendant, though plainly aware that a contract had been made, did not ask to see the contract, appears to us to be consistent only with the view that he was not interested in its contents save as regarded the question of the plaintiff's intentions on the matter of residence. That this would have been a reasonable attitude on the defendant's part appears to us to be confirmed by the fact that Mr. Hatch saw nothing unreasonable in it and did not even show the contract to the defendant but assumed that it had been authorised.

In the view which we take it is, therefore, unnecessary to consider whether, if the making of the contract by Ward & Co. was in fact unauthorised, the defendant must be taken to have authorised Mr. Hatch to ratify the agency which Ward & Co. assumed. The appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Vizard, Oldham, Crowder & Cash, agents for Mills & Reeve, Norwich (for the plaintiff); McKenna & Co., agents for Hatch & Hatch, Norwich (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re ROSE (deceased). MIDLAND BANK EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE CO., LTD. v. ROSE AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), November 3, 4, 1948.]

Will—Legacy—General or specific—Shares in private companies—Number of shares bequeathed amounting to exact number held by testator—No words indicating testator's ownership of shares bequeathed.

Will—Ademption—Gift of shares—Option to purchase granted by testator after date of will—Exercise of option after testator's death—Gift inter vivos—Gift of shares in private company if such shares not transferred to legatee "previously to my death"—Transfer executed by testator during his lifetime—Refusal of directors to register transfer until after testator's death.

By his will, dated Dec. 6, 1943, the testator expressed his desire, in cl. 2 (2), that his executors should consult his accountant "as to the best method of realising my shares in H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd.", and, by cl. 3, he gave the following legacies (inter alia): "(a) to my niece M.R. 500 preference and 500 ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son Ltd. . . . (b) to my nephew Michael R. 500 preference shares and 500 ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son Ltd. . . . (g) to E. H. . . . 8,300 ordinary shares in H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd. and I also give him 5,000 preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd. if such preference shares have not been transferred to him previously to my death. (h) to W. J. . . . 2,189 ordinary shares, 5,000 preference shares . . . in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd." The testator then gave his residuary estate to W. J. At the date of his will, the testator had exactly the number of ordinary and preference shares in the two companies respectively as were disposed of by his will. Both the companies were private limited companies. In August, 1944, the testator executed in E. H.'s favour a transfer of 5,000 preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd., and handed it to E. H. together with the relevant certificates, but, as the company was a private one, the right to claim registration of transfers was subject to the consent of the directors. During the testator's lifetime the directors refused to register the transfer, but they registered it after his death, which took place on Jan. 7, 1946. Shortly before his death, the testator sold his ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd., and granted an option, which was exercised after his death, to purchase the preference shares in that company. The questions to be determined were (inter alia) whether the gifts of shares in cl. 3 (a), (b), (g) and (h) were specific or general gifts, and, if they were specific, whether, in the events that had happened, there had been an ademption of the preference shares given in cl. 3 (a), (b) and (g):—

HELD: (i) the gift of the preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. to E. H., in cl. 3 (g), was clearly a specific gift, notwithstanding the fact that the testator did not use the possessive pronoun in disposing of the shares, and, accordingly, the gifts of the other shares in that company, in cl. 3 (g) and (h), were also specific.

(ii) on the true construction of the will there were sufficient indications therein that the testator was intending in cl. 3 (a) and (b) to dispose specifically of the shares which he actually owned at the date of the will in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd., and, therefore, the gifts in cl. 3 (a) and (b) were specific gifts.

(iii) in the events that had happened, there was an ademption of the preference shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd., given by cl. 3 (a) and (b).

Re Carrington, Ralphs v. Swithenbank ([1932] 1 Ch. 1; 145 L.T. 284), followed.

(iv) since the testator had done everything in his power to divest himself of the preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd., in favour of E. H., the shares had been transferred to E. H. previously to the testator's death within the meaning of cl. 3 (g) of the will, and, as E. H.'s title under the transfer was perfected by registration after the testator's death, E. H. took the shares as a gift inter vivos, and the gift of those shares in cl. 3 (g) of the will was wholly adeemed by the gift inter vivos.

Milroy v. Lord (1862) (4 De G.F. & J. 264; 7 L.T. 178) and Re Fry, Chase National Executors & Trustees Corp'n. v. Fry ([1946] 2 All E.R. 106; [1946] Ch. 312; 175 L.T. 392), distinguished.

[AS TO ADEEMPTION OF SPECIFIC GIFTS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 127-130, paras. 164, 165; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 403-414, Nos. 2355-2448, and Vol. 20, pp. 356-358, Nos. 951-966.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Robinson v. Addison, (1840), 2 Beav. 515; 9 L.J.Ch. 369; 44 Digest 298, 1299.
- (2) Macdonald v. Irvine, (1878), 8 Ch.D. 101; 47 L.J.Ch. 494; 38 L.T. 155; 44 Digest 198, 274.
- (3) Re Willcocks, Warwick v. Willcocks, [1921] 2 Ch. 327; 91 L.J.Ch. 27; 126 L.T. 86; 44 Digest 296, 1276.
- (4) Re Gage, Crozier v. Gutheridge, [1934] Ch. 536; 103 L.J.Ch. 241; 151 L.T. 240; Digest Supp.
- (5) Re O'Connor, Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. O'Connor, [1948] 2 All E.R. 270; [1948] Ch. 628; [1948] L.J.R. 1606.
- (6) Re Pratt, Pratt v. Pratt, [1894] 1 Ch. 491; 63 L.J.Ch. 484; 70 L.T. 489; 23 Digest 424, 4952.
- (7) Re Nottage, Jones v. Palmer (No. 2), [1895] 2 Ch. 657; 64 L.J.Ch. 695; sub nom. Re Nottage, Nottage v. Palmer (No. 1), 73 L.T. 265; 44 Digest 705, 5480.
- (8) Re Carrington, Ralphs v. Swithenbank, [1932] 1 Ch. 1; 100 L.J.Ch. 299; 145 L.T. 284; Digest Supp.
- (9) Milroy v. Lord, (1862), 4 De G.F. & J. 264; 31 L.J.Ch. 798; 7 L.T. 178; 25 Digest 530, 206.
- (10) Re Fry, Chase National Executors & Trustees Corp'n. v. Fry, [1946] 2 All E.R. 106; [1946] Ch. 312; 115 L.J.Ch. 225; 175 L.T. 392; 2nd Digest Supp.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether, on the true construction of the testator's will, certain gifts of shares were general or specific gifts, and, if they were specific, whether, in the events that had happened, some of these gifts had been adeemed. The facts and the relevant provisions of the will appear in the judgment.

R. J. S. Thompson (G. Maddocks with him) for the plaintiffs (the executors).

F. G. King for the first defendant, Margaret Rose.

Tonge for the second defendant, Michael Rose.

Sir Andrew Clark, K.C., and Guest Mathews for the third defendant, E. E. Hook.

F. B. Alcock for the fourth defendant, Winifred Rose.

JENKINS, J.: The first question which I have to decide is whether certain gifts of shares made by the testator are specific gifts or are in the nature of general legacies. The testator's will is dated Dec. 6, 1943. There was a codicil dated July 4, 1944, on which nothing turns, and he died on Jan. 7, 1946, his will being proved on Dec. 18, 1946. The relevant provisions of the will are these. He revoked all former wills and testamentary dispositions and appointed the Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co., Ltd., the present plaintiffs, to be executors and trustees of his will. Then he gave this direction by cl. 2 (2) of his will:

"I desire the company [Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co., Ltd.] to consult Mr. Herbert A. Cox my accountant of Messrs Woodman Cox & Wilkins as to the best method of realising my shares in H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd."

Clause 3 is :

A "I give and bequeath the following legacies all free of estate duty and all other death duties : (a) To my niece Margaret Rose 500 preference and 500 ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd. of Bedford ; (b) To my nephew Michael Rose 500 preference shares and 500 ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd. of Bedford ; (c) £250 to each of the following employees of H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. [There followed an enumeration of the beneficiaries under that provision] (d) £250 to each of the following [named legatees]".

By paras. (e) and (f) the testator gives pecuniary legacies of £250 to each of two other legatees. Then comes paras. (g) and (h), and cl. 4 :

C "(g) To Ernest E. Hook (now of 280 Norwood Road Southall and at present in the employ of H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd.) 8300 ordinary shares in H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd. and I also give him 5000 preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd. if such preference shares have not been transferred to him previously to my death. (h) To Miss Winifred Jameson at present residing at 40 Foley Street London W.1. 2189 ordinary shares 5000 preference shares and £6000 debentures in H. G. Sanders & Son Ltd. 4. As to all the rest residue and remainder of my property both D real and personal of whatsoever kind or nature and wheresoever situate including any property over which I have any general testamentary power of disposition I give devise and bequeath the same (subject to my just debts funeral and testamentary expenses and death duties) to the said Miss Winifred Jameson at present residing at 40 Foley Street London W.1. absolutely and beneficially."

E It appears that at the date of his will and also at the date of the codicil the testator held 1,000 preference shares and 1,000 ordinary shares of £1 each in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd. At the same dates he held 10,000 6 per cent. preference shares and 10,489 ordinary shares of £1 each, and £2,200 first debentures and £3,800 second debentures in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. The circumstances which make the question I am now considering material (as raising a case of F ademption in the event of the legacies being held specific) need not, I think, be gone into in any detail for the present purpose. Briefly, what happened was that in the testator's lifetime [about October, 1945] Debenhams acquired his ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd. for £10 a share, and acquired an option, which was exercised after his death, to purchase the preference shares in the same company for 27s. a share. A very material point which G emerges from the evidence is that the gifts by the testator of preference and ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd. and of preference and ordinary shares and debentures in the other company, H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd., add up to exactly the numbers of preference shares and ordinary shares and amounts of debentures held by the testator in those companies respectively at the date of his will. A further point of importance appearing from the evidence is that H E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd. is a private limited company, which means that there would be no free market in its shares and that a transfer of its shares would be subject to one or other of the forms of restriction appropriate in the case of private companies. This observation also applies to H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd.

I turn now to the consideration of the question which is primarily one of the construction of the will, though the numerous authorities bearing on this subject provide guidance as to the rules or principles of construction to be followed in its solution. One starts with the general proposition that the court leans against specific legacies, and is inclined, if it can, to construe a legacy as general rather than specific, so that, if there is any doubt, it should, on the whole, be resolved in favour of the view that the legacy is general. There are certain other principles to be extracted from the authorities, to which I propose now briefly to refer.

The earliest case in order of date to which I will refer is Robinson v. Addison (1). In that case the testator made a gift of 15½ shares of the Leeds and Liverpool Canal. It was held that that gift was general and not specific, even though the testator referred to the exact number of shares which he held and they were shares which were not readily marketable. Those two points were dealt with by LORD LANGDALE, M.R. (2 Beav. 519, 520), and the conclusion to which he came was that those two circumstances were not enough to make the gift specific. It was held in Macdonald v. Irvine (2), that a legacy of 500 Egyptian 9 per cent. bonds was not specific, though the testator had such bonds at the time and the will contained other gifts of bonds of the same description in terms which made them clearly specific gifts. The effect of the decision in Re Willcocks, Warwick v. Willcocks (3) appears from the headnote :

"The bequest of a sum of stock in pounds, shillings and pence, being the exact amount of the stock the testator possesses at the date of his will, is a general legacy unless there is something else on the face of the will to indicate that the testator intended it to be specific."

P. O. LAWRENCE, J., dealt ([1921] 2 Ch. 329) with the question of the gift being in pounds, shillings and pence as opposed to being in round numbers, and (ibid., 330) he dealt with an additional point, viz., the effect of the residuary gift being in the form "the remainder of my real and personal estate." He held that it would be attaching too much importance to the words of the residuary gift to hold that they had the effect of making the legacies which preceded it specific.

Then I was referred to Re Gage, Crozier v. Gutheridge (4), a decision of CLAUSON, J., in the case of a gift of £1,150 5 per cent. war loan. The question about it arose owing to the conversion of the loan of that particular issue. CLAUSON, J., held ([1934] 1 Ch. 539) :

"It is clear that notwithstanding that the testator at the time he made his will did in fact hold that precise amount of the war loan described in his will, I am bound, in the absence of the possessive pronoun or of some other context indicating that the stock which he intended to give by his will was the very stock of which he was then the holder, to hold that bequest to be a general bequest and not a specific bequest."

Next I should mention Re O'Connor, Westminster Bank, Ltd. v. O'Connor (5), the most recent case on this subject. The gift under consideration in that case was a bequest to the testator's son of 10,000 preference shares of £1 each fully paid in a named company. The company was a private company in which the testator at his death held only 9,000 preference shares as compared with the 10,000 he purported to give by his will. The will included a residuary gift to trustees on trust for sale with a direction for payment of "the pecuniary legacies hereinbefore bequeathed." ROXBURGH, J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 271) :

"... there are two points in favour of either view. In favour of it being a general legacy is the fact that there is nothing in the language of cl. 5 of the will to indicate that the testator is describing specific property of his. For example, the testator does not use the word 'my' or any possessive word . . . The second point, a very strong one, in favour of the legacy being general, is that the testator never had 10,000 preference shares either at the date of his will or at the date of his death, but only 9,000, and, accordingly, if he did intend by this clause to make a specific disposition of his own property, he must have been misinformed as to the extent of that property. The two points in favour of the legacy being specific are, first, the circumstance that the bequest deals with a private company of which the testator was the manager and governing director, and in which the shares were subject to the restrictions usual in the case of a private company, and, secondly—and this is very important—the testator clearly did not include the disposition in cl. 5 of the preference shares among the dispositions which his executors and trustees were to satisfy out of residue.”

A little later, ROXBURGH, J., said (ibid., 272) :

“In the circumstances, what ought I to hold ? There is no doubt that the court leans strongly in favour of a general legacy. How strongly is apparent from Re Willcocks (3). If the testator, instead of referring to 10,000 preference shares, had referred to 9,000 or less preference shares in cl. 5, I should have held that there was sufficient context here to carry me to the other side of the line . . .”

In the result, the learned judge, taking into consideration all the points bearing either way, came to the conclusion that the legacy in that case was a general legacy. Although that was the result in that particular case, it is important to observe the reference by the learned judge to the character of the company and to the number of shares given as compared with the number held by the testator at the date of his will. He indicates that, if the testator had referred to the exact number, he would have thought that there was sufficient context to carry him to the other side of the line. That, of course, must be read in the light of the fact that the will before the learned judge in that case did contain an indication not present here in the special form of residuary bequest.

Those were the cases cited to me on behalf of the parties concerned to show that the legacies in this will are general legacies. On the other side I was referred by counsel for the defendant, Ernest Hook, to Re Pratt, Pratt v. Pratt (6) and Re Nottage, Jones v. Palmer (No. 2) (7). In Re Pratt (6) a legacy of £800 “invested in” 2½ per cent. consols in a will where the context had some bearing on the point was held to be specific and not demonstrative. The judgment of NORTH, J., in that case shows that the question was one in answering which regard must be had to the particular will as a whole, the question being, like any other question of construction of a will, a matter of arriving at the testator’s intention from the language he has used in the context in which he uses it. In Re Nottage (7) the circumstance that certain gifts of investments were clearly intended to be specific was held to afford a sufficient indication, in conjunction, of course, with the other features of the will, that other associated gifts, if I may so describe them, of investments in words which, if they had stood alone, might have been consistent with their being general legacies, made gifts of that doubtful character specific. I think, for the present purpose, I can content myself with reading this passage from the end of the judgment of RIGBY, L.J. ([1895] 2 Ch. 665):

“But when a man has different kinds of investments, and by his will deals with them all, dealing with some of them in such a way as to make it absolutely clear that he intended specific gifts, and with regard to all there are expressions in the will which agree better with the hypothesis that the gifts are specific than that they are general, I think we may safely conclude that the gifts of investments of particular descriptions are specific.”

I return to the will. In cl. 2 (2) the testator expresses the desire that the Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co., Ltd., should consult his accountant “ . . . as to the best method of realising my shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd." That carries one this far, that, at any rate, so far as H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd., are concerned, the testator is making his will with reference to the fact that at the date of the will he is a holder of shares in that company. In cl. 3 come the words of gift which govern all the bequests which follow: "I give and bequeath the following legacies all free of estate duty and all other death duties . . ." The first two gifts are (a) and (b), the gift to Margaret Rose of 500 preference shares and 500 ordinary shares in H. P. Rose & Son, Ltd., and to Michael Rose 500 preference and 500 ordinary shares in the same company. So far, having looked at the surrounding circumstances, one finds that by those two gifts, (a) and (b), the testator is, in fact, disposing of the exact total numbers of preference and ordinary shares in the company in question which he held at the date of his will. Coupled with the fact that the company was a private company, that exactly produces the situation which ROXBURGH, J., thought would have been sufficient in Re O'Connor (5) to take the gift to the other side of the line, but one has not here the significant residuary gift in the particular form which was present in Re O'Connor (5), and so far, therefore, it is doubtful, in my judgment, whether there is enough in this case to put the gifts in question over the line, though they are very near the line.

After the series of pecuniary legacies in cl. 3 (c) to (f), one gets the gifts of the shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd.:

"(g) To Ernest E. Hook . . . 8,300 ordinary shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. and I also give him 5,000 preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. if such preference shares have not been transferred to him previously to my death. (h) To Miss Winifred Jameson . . . 2,189 ordinary shares, 5,000 preference shares and £6,000 debentures in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd."

When one comes to these gifts, one is struck at once by the fact that, just as in the case of the preference and ordinary shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd., the testator has disposed of the exact numbers or amounts of preference and ordinary shares and debentures possessed by him at the date of the will in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. He has divided them up exactly between the two beneficiaries so as to exhaust the total. I think this fact becomes more significant when one sees such numbers as 8,300 ordinary shares to Mr. Hook and 2,189 ordinary shares to Miss Winifred Jameson (who is now the defendant, Mrs. Winifred Rose [the testator's widow]), making the exact total holding of 10,489 ordinary shares. The matter, however, does not rest there because the language of cl. 3 (g) is such as to make it abundantly plain on the face of the will that the testator's gift of preference shares to Mr. Hook can only be a specific gift:

"I give . . . to Ernest E. Hook . . . 8,300 ordinary shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. and I also give him 5,000 preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. if such preference shares have not been transferred to him previously to my death."

That gift of preference shares to Mr. Hook obviously must be intended by the testator to be a specific gift, but he makes it in the form: "I also give him 5,000 preference shares." He does not introduce the possessive pronoun, although clearly meaning the gift to be specific. I think it follows from that that the gift of 8,300 ordinary shares to the same legatee must also be specific and that when the testator goes on to make to Mrs. Winifred Rose the gift of 2,189 ordinary shares, 5,000 preference shares and £6,000 debentures in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd., he is in like manner disposing of specific property, the remainder of his holdings of shares and debentures in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd., after providing for the specific gift of part of his holdings of preference and ordinary shares to Mr. Hook.

One then arrives at the conclusion on cl. 3 (g) and (h) that the testator is making what are clearly specific gifts without thinking it necessary to use the possessive pronoun—without thinking it necessary to say, e.g., “my 5,000 preference shares.” One is entitled, having collected that from cl. 3 (g) and (h), to go back and reconsider cl. 3 (a) and (b), where the gifts have so far been left trembling in the balance. If the testator had put “500 of my preference shares and 500 of my ordinary shares,” the case would have been clear beyond argument. He would, in so many words, have made those gifts specific. It is the absence of those words which gives rise to the whole difficulty, but, having looked at cl. 3 as a whole, one finds that the testator does, in fact, in paras. (g) and (h) make what must be specific gifts without the use of the possessive pronoun. One can, therefore, in my judgment, discount its absence in paras. (a) and (b) and, having regard to the other considerations to which I have referred, find that, notwithstanding the leaning of the court against specific legacies, there are sufficient indications in this will, read as a whole in the light of the relevant surrounding circumstances, to constrain the court to hold that here the testator was intending to dispose specifically of the shares he actually owned at the date of his will in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd., by dividing them in effect equally between his niece, Margaret, and his nephew, Michael.

For these reasons, I propose to declare, in answer to question 1 of the summons, that the gifts in question were specific gifts.

In answer to question 2 of the summons, it seems that I am bound on the authority of Re Carrington, Ralphs v. Swithenbank (8), and the long line of authorities there referred to, to hold that in this case there was ademption as to the gifts of preference shares in E. P. Rose & Son, Ltd., which I have held to be specific gifts.

The next question arises on the gift to Mr. Ernest Hook of 5,000 preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd. :

“ . . . if such preference shares have not been transferred to him previously to my death.”

The question I have to decide is whether, on the facts, such preference shares had been transferred to Mr. Hook previously to the testator's death within the meaning of that provision in the will. It appears that in August, 1944, the testator handed to Mr. Hook a transfer executed by himself in Mr. Hook's favour of 5,000 preference shares in H. G. Sanders & Son, Ltd., together with the relevant certificates. That was a voluntary transfer, but it is not disputed that it was intended by the testator to be a transfer by way of gift and not a transfer which, when perfected by registration, would give rise to a resulting trust. The company was a private company, and the right to claim registration of transfers was, therefore, subject to restrictions giving the directors a discretion in the matter. There is evidence from one of the directors of the company, Mr. Richardson, with respect, so far as is material for the present purpose, to the 5,000 preference shares to the effect that the directors, of whom he was one, decided that it was not in the interests of the company to register the transfer to Mr. Hook. He goes on to say :

“ After the death of the testator, seeing that the testator had by his will bequeathed a considerable number of ordinary and of preference shares in the company to the said Ernest Edward Hook, the directors thought it right in fairness to him to pass the two transfers . . . ”

(that is to say, the transfer now in question, and a transfer of ordinary shares with which I am not for the moment concerned). Mr. Richardson goes on to say :

“ This was accordingly done, and the said Mr. Hook became registered as proprietor of . . . ”

so far as is material, the preference shares in question.

It is argued on behalf of the residuary legatee that the testator's transfer of the 5,000 preference shares to Mr. Hook was at the time of the testator's death in the state of being an incomplete or inchoate gift, owing to the fact that the transfer was not registered in the testator's lifetime. I was referred to Milroy v. Lord (9) and also to Re Fry, Chase National Executors & Trustees Corp'n. v. Fry (10). Those cases, as I understand them, turn on the fact that the deceased donor had not done all in his power, according to the nature of the property given, to vest the legal interest in the property in the donee. In such circumstances it is well settled that there is no equity to complete the imperfect gift. If any act remains to be done by the donor to complete the gift at the date of the donor's death, the court will not compel his personal representatives to do that act and the gift remains incomplete and fails. In Milroy v. Lord (9) the imperfection was due to the fact that the wrong form of transfer was used for the purpose of transferring certain bank shares. The document was not the appropriate document to pass any interest in the property at all. In Re Fry (10) the flaw in the transaction, which was a transfer or transfers of shares in a certain company, was failure to obtain the consent of the Treasury which, in the circumstances surrounding the transfers in question, was necessary under the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, and it was held that the donor's executors ought not to execute confirmatory transfers. That is, of course, exactly in accordance with the principle that equity will not compel an imperfect gift to be completed. Something had to be done by the donor's executors if the gift was to be completed, and that was the execution of further transfers which were not open to the objection of the absence of Treasury consent.

In this case, as I understand it, the testator had done everything in his power to divest himself of the shares in question in favour of Mr. Hook. He had executed a transfer. It is not suggested that the transfer was not in accordance with the company's regulations. He had handed that transfer together with the certificates to Mr. Hook. There was nothing else the testator could do. It is true that Mr. Hook's legal title would not be perfected until the directors passed the transfer for registration, but that was not an act which the testator had to do; it was an act which depended on the discretion of the directors. Therefore, it seems to me that the present case is not in pari materia with the two cases to which I have been referred. The real position, in my judgment, is that the question here is one of construction of the will. The testator says:

"... if such preference shares have not been transferred to him previously to my death."

The position was that, so far as the testator was concerned, they had been so transferred. The testator had executed a proper transfer and had delivered it with the certificates to Mr. Hook. In my judgment, in that state of affairs the shares had been transferred to Mr. Hook previously to the testator's death within the meaning of that provision. It cannot, in my judgment, be held that by using those words the testator intended the efficacy of the provision to depend on whether the act of third parties, namely, the directors, necessary to complete the legal title in Mr. Hook by registration should have been performed before or after his death. That circumstance seems to me to be wholly irrelevant for the purposes of the provision in question.

What actually happened was that the transfer having been executed and the certificates handed over by the testator in his lifetime, Mr. Hook's title under the transfer was in fact completed by registration after the testator's death. In my judgment, therefore, the position is that the shares had been transferred to Mr. Hook previously to the testator's death within the meaning of cl. 3 (g) of the will, and his title under the transfer to him was perfected after the death by registration, and he takes the shares comprised in the transfer by virtue of the transfer and not under the will. The consequence is, in my judgment, that the shares are taken by Mr. Hook under his inter vivos title and in satisfaction of the 5,000 preference shares which I have already held to have been specifically given to him. Therefore, in the events which have happened the gift by the will of the 5,000 preference shares did not take effect, but was wholly adeemed or wholly satisfied by the gift inter vivos.

A Declaration accordingly. Costs of all parties as between solicitors and client to be paid in due course of administration out of the estate.

Solicitors: Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker (for the plaintiffs and the fourth defendant); Thorne, Owles & Neale (for the first defendant); Vandercom, Stanton & Co. (for the second defendant); J. A. Ramsey (for the third defendant).

B [Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re BOWEN (deceased), TREASURY SOLICITOR v. BOWEN.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (WYNN-PARRY, J.), October 26, 27, 1948.]

C Will—Gift over after prior limitation—Particular condition not satisfied—Ultimate gift over on death of prior donee during lifetime of testator's mother—Death of prior donee after death of testator's mother but during lifetime of testator.

D By his will the testator gave his residuary estate to his mother for life and after her death to his uncle, E.B. He then directed: "In the event of my said uncle E.B. dying in my mother's lifetime then I give my said real and personal estate to his children as tenants in common in equal shares." The mother predeceased the testator and the uncle survived the mother but died during the testator's lifetime, leaving children.

E HELD: on the true construction of the will, it was the testator's intention that the uncle's children should take if the uncle was dead at the date of distribution; the rule in Jones v. Westcomb, (1711) (Prec. Ch. 316) applied; and, therefore, there was no intestacy, and the residuary estate became divisible on the testator's death equally between the uncle's children.

F Davies v. Davies (1882) (47 L.T. 40), Jones v. Westcomb (1711) (Prec. Ch. 316), and Re Fox's Estate ([1937] 4 All E.R. 664), applied.

Re Graham ([1929] 2 Ch. 127; 141 L.T. 197), distinguished.

[FOR THE RULE IN Jones v. Westcomb, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, p. 376, para. 421; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 1172-1182, Nos. 10148-10218.]

G Cases referred to:

(1) Jones v. Westcomb, (1711), Prec. Ch. 316; Gilb. Ch. 74; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 245; 44 Digest 1175, 10165.

(2) Re Fox's Estate, Dawes v. Druitt, Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Fox, [1937] 4 All E.R. 664; Digest Supp.

(3) Davies v. Davies, (1882), 47 L.T. 40; 44 Digest 1159, 10037.

H (4) Re Graham, Graham v. Graham, [1929] 2 Ch. 127; 98 L.J.Ch. 291; 141 L.T. 197; Digest Supp.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION of a summons taken out by the Treasury Solicitor for the administration of the testator's estate.

By his will, dated Jan. 2, 1931, the testator appointed executors and trustees thereof and gave his real and personal estate, subject to payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, to his trustees on trust for his mother "during her life and from and after her decease" on trust for Evan Bowen, subject to and charged with the payment of certain legacies. He then directed "In the event of . . . Evan Bowen dying in my mother's lifetime then I give my said real and personal estate subject to and charged as aforesaid to his children as tenants in common in equal shares." The testator died on Mar. 16, 1941. His mother predeceased him, and Evan Bowen survived the mother but died during the testator's lifetime, leaving children. The question was whether, in the events that had happened, the residuary estate was left undisposed of, and, as the testator left no issue and had no relatives, the Treasury Solicitor claimed that all property as to which the testator died intestate belonged beneficially to the Crown as bona vacantia. On the hearing of the originating summons, on Apr. 23, 1945, an order was made for administration of the estate. On July 14, 1948, a summons for further consideration came before the master, but, as no declaration was made in the order of Apr. 23, 1945, to the effect that the Crown was entitled as bona vacantia to all property as to which the testator died intestate, the summons was directed to be set down for further consideration under R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 21. WYNN-PARRY, J., now held that there was no intestacy and that the testator's residuary estate became divisible on his death equally between the children of Evan Bowen.

McMullen (Danckwerts with him) for the Treasury Solicitor.

H. E. Francis for the defendant, a child of Evan Bowen.

WYNN-PARRY, J: It is clear that the exact event on which the gift over in favour of the children of Evan Bowen was expressed to take effect, namely, the death of Evan Bowen in the lifetime of the testator's mother, has not happened. In those circumstances it has been contended for the Treasury Solicitor that there is an intestacy, while for the defendant it was argued that the testator must a fortiori have intended, in the events which have happened, that the children of Evan Bowen should take.

The argument for the defendant is based on the well-known rule in Jones v. Westcomb (1) which was considered by the Court of Appeal in Re Fox's Estate, Daves v. Druitt, Phoenix Assurance Co., Ltd. v. Fox (2). The headnote of the report of the latter case is as follows:

"Testator gave all his 'substance' to his executors upon trust as to one quarter for his daughter F.S. for her separate use, as to one other quarter for his daughter A.C. for her sole use for life, and thereafter for her children if she leave any equally, as to another quarter for the children of his deceased son G.J. equally, and as to the last quarter for W.S. and T.S. The testator declared that the benefits under his will should become vested on the coming of age of the legatee, and that any legacy which by the death of any person should lapse should go to F.S. A.C. survived the testator but died without having ever had any children, and her share lapsed for that reason. The question raised was whether the gift over to F.S. upon lapse by reason of the death of any person took effect in these circumstances:— HELD: (i) the one quarter given to A.C. did not lapse by the death of any person, but for the reason that A.C. had never had any children. (ii) the gift over took effect under the rule in Jones v. Westcomb (1) that, by necessary implication, the testator must be taken to have made provision for the event which had happened as well as for the lapse by reason of the death of any person. (iii) 'Lapse' in this will did not refer only to the failure of a gift by reason of the death of a legatee in the testator's lifetime."

In the course of his judgment, ROMER, L.J., said ([1937] 4 All E.R. 668):

"That being so, it appears to me that the principle applied in the case of Jones v. Westcomb (1) comes properly into operation. That principle is stated in this way in THEOBALD ON WILLS, 8th ed., p. 739, and I think it is rightly stated there: 'There is, however, a class of case where, though the exact event upon which the gift over is to take effect does not happen, the gift over must a fortiori have been intended to take effect in the event which happens.' The principle is applicable, therefore, only in those cases where the court, looking at all the relevant circumstances of the case, including, of course, the will itself, comes to the conclusion that the testator must a fortiori have intended the disposition over to take effect in the event which has actually happened, although it is not the event which he has specified in his will as the one in which the gift over is to take effect. Looking at all the circumstances of this case, can anyone doubt for one moment that, if the testator had been asked what was to happen to this share of Mrs. Perry if she died without ever having had a child at all, the testator would have said: 'A fortiori the share is to go to my daughter Fanny.' I agree, therefore, that the appeal must succeed."

In applying the principle enunciated in Jones v. Westcomb (1) the courts have considered what was the real contingency guarded against, and an example of this is afforded by Davies v. Davies (3). In that case:

"A testator, by his will, gave his residuary estate upon trust for his wife for life, providing she should survive him 12 months and remained unmarried, and he gave to his wife power to dispose by will of one-half of the estate, and gave the other half after her decease to his sister J., or, in case of her predecease, to other persons; and he directed that, in case of his wife dying within 12 months from his own decease, his whole estate should go to his said sister, with a gift over as before in case of her predecease, and he made a similar provision with respect to one-half of the estate in the event of his wife omitting to make a will. The testator's wife died in his lifetime, and his sister J. survived him. HELD: that the contingencies against which the testator guarded, and which the court, in construing the will, was bound to regard, were the event of his wife not being alive at the expiration of 12 months from his own decease, and the event of their being no testamentary disposition by her, and that, in the events which had happened, the gift over in favour of the testator's sister took effect."

Fry, J., in the course of his judgment said (47 L.T. 42):

"Coming back again to the two classes of contingencies, the first is undoubtedly expressed in these words: 'In case of my wife Frances Mary Davies dying within twelve months of my decease.' That undoubtedly, in my judgment, contemplates two things, first, the wife surviving the testator, and, secondly, her dying within the twelve months. I come to that conclusion because, according to my understanding of the words, a person dying within the twelve months does not literally mean a person dying before the end of the twelve months, but it means being alive at the beginning and dead at the end of the period. That observation does not conclude the matter, because in all these cases the court has to inquire what is the real meaning and object of the clause. What, as has been said in several cases, is the contingency guarded against? Now what, I ask myself, is the contingency guarded against here? Is it the contingency of the wife living after the testator, and then dying within that period; or is it the contingency of the wife not being alive at the expiration of that period? I have already stated that, according to my view of the general scope of the will, it is the latter and not the former, and it is difficult to frame to oneself any reason why survivorship of the wife for a day should be essential for the sister taking the entire interest in this property. The contingency that the testator contemplated was the wife's living or her having died at the expiration of the twelve months, and, if the court comes to that conclusion, there is no difficulty whatever in giving effect to the obvious intention of the testator."

It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider in the light of the will and the relevant circumstances what was the real contingency which this testator contemplated when making the gift to the children of Evan Bowen. In the present case the relevant circumstances are these. The testator's only next of kin was his mother, and, apart from her, it appears that his nearest natural relations were his uncle, Evan Bowen, and his uncle's children. He appointed two of these children, including the defendant, to be executors of his will. By his will he gave a life interest only to his mother, and after her death he gave his estate (charged with the payment of certain legacies) to his uncle. The gift to the uncle was not conditional. He then proceeds as follows :

"In the event of my said uncle Evan Bowen dying in my mother's lifetime then I give my said real and personal estate subject to and charged as aforesaid to his children as tenants in common in equal shares."

It was contended for the defendant that the words "in my mother's lifetime" were introduced simply as a measure of the life interest of the mother, and that the plain intention of the testator was that the uncle's children should take if the uncle was dead at the date of distribution.

Putting aside for the moment Re Graham, Graham v. Graham (4) which is relied on by the plaintiff, I feel no difficulty in applying in the present case the test adopted by ROMER, L.J., in Re Fox's Estate (2). If the testator had been asked what was to happen to his residuary estate if the uncle was alive at the death of the mother, but had died in the testator's lifetime, I think he would unhesitatingly have said : "Then, of course, the children are to take." It seems to me, therefore, that prima facie this case, when properly examined, falls within the principle of Jones v. Westcomb (1). It remains to consider Re Graham (4). The headnote is as follows :

"By her will, after giving life interests to her parents, a testatrix devised and bequeathed her real and personal estate to her husband, but if he should have predeceased both her parents, then to her husband's children, whether by herself or his first wife. The husband survived both the parents, but predeceased the testatrix. The testatrix left no issue of her own, but at her death there were six children of her husband's first marriage living :— HELD : there was no implication of a gift over to those children on failure of the gift to the husband by lapse in any event, and therefore the residuary estate of the testatrix was undisposed of and passed to her next of kin."

It appears from the judgment that EVE, J., treated the gift to the husband in that case as conditional, because he said ([1929] 2 Ch. 130) :

"The husband had satisfied the condition of the gift in the lifetime of the testatrix . . ."

In the case now before me it appears to me, on the true construction of this will, that the gift to the uncle was not conditional. I think that the case of Re Graham (4) is distinguishable, and I feel free to apply the test indicated by ROMER, L.J., in Re Fox's Estate (2).

In my judgment, therefore, the principle of Jones v. Westcomb (1) applies here and I hold that, on the true construction of this testator's will, there is no intestacy and that his residuary estate became divisible equally between the children of Evan Bowen.

Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors : Treasury Solicitor ; T. D. Jones & Co., agents for Jean J. Luke, Newcastle Emlyn (for the defendant).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

MUNRO v. WILLMOTT.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lynskey, J.), November 4, 5, 8, 1948.]

Agency—Agency of necessity—Gratuitous bailee—Sale of bailed goods—Owner's instructions unobtainable.

Detinue—Conversion—Damages—Gratuitous bailee—Instructions of owner of goods unobtainable—Sale without instructions—Date at which damages assessable—Expenditure by bailee on goods.

By permission of the licensee the owner of a motor car left it for nearly three years in the yard of an inn. The licensee found that it was causing difficulty to drivers of vehicles using the yard, particularly ambulances of the St. John's Ambulance Corps, to whom a garage on the premises was let. Being unable to trace the owner, he had repairs carried out on the car at a cost of £85, and then had it sold by auction for £105, less commission amounting to £5. The value of the car was £120 at the date of judgment.

HELD : (i) the doctrine of agency of necessity could be applied to goods stored in premises, if at all, only in a case of emergency necessitating the disposal of the goods which did not exist here, and, accordingly, the licensee was liable to the owner for detinue and conversion of the car.

(ii) the measure of damages for the conversion and in detinue was the value of the car at the date of judgment less any increase in value attributable to the expenditure of money on it by the licensee, and judgment would, therefore, be given for the plaintiff for £35.

Rosenthal v. Alderton & Sons, Ltd. ([1946] 1 All E.R. 583; [1946] K.B. 374; 174 L.T. 214) and Sachs v. Miklos ([1948] 1 All E.R. 67; [1948] 2 K.B. 23), applied.

[AS TO ACTS AMOUNTING TO CONVERSION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 33, pp. 52-56, paras. 84-90; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 43, pp. 469-485, Nos. 86-222.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Sachs v. Miklos, [1948] 1 All E.R. 67; [1948] 2 K.B. 23; [1948] L.J.R. 1012.
- (2) Gwilliam v. Twist, [1895] 2 Q.B. 84; 64 L.J.Q.B. 474; 72 L.T. 579; 59 J.P. 484; 1 Digest 390, 941.
- (3) Ottoman Bank v. Jebara, [1928] A.C. 269; 97 L.J.K.B. 502; 139 L.T. 194; revsq. S.C. sub nom. Jebara v. Ottoman Bank, [1927] 2 K.B. 254; 43 Digest 481, 188.
- (4) Rosenthal v. Alderton & Sons, Ltd., [1946] 1 All E.R. 583; [1946] K.B. 374; 115 L.J.K.B. 215; 174 L.T. 214; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (5) Reid v. Fairbanks, (1853), 13 C.B. 692; 1 C.L.R. 787; 21 L.T.O.S. 166; sub. nom. Read v. Fairbanks, 22 L.J.C.P. 206; 43 Digest 509, 484.

ACTION for the return of a motor car or for damages for conversion.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Ethel Ada Munro, lived with her stepfather and her mother, Mr. and Mrs. Proctor, in a caravan, from which during the war they worked a haulage business under a contract or sub-contract with George Wimpey & Co., Ltd., in connection with the construction of various aerodromes. In July, 1941, they bought an S.S. Super Swallow 16 h.p. saloon car from a Mr. Fowgies for £80. According to the stepfather's evidence the car was to be a present from him to the plaintiff and it was delivered to her and registered and licensed under the Road Traffic Acts in her name. About December, 1941, the family were ordered to go to Brackley where the defendant, Mr. R. H. Willmott, the licensee and tenant of the Bell Inn, Brackley, for a rent of 5s. a week allowed them to park their caravan, the car and two lorries in the inn yard. In September, 1942, they were moved by George Wimpey & Co., Ltd., to another site, and, as they had to leave hurriedly, they could not take the car because it was not licensed, the steering gear was defective, and the accumulator was with the local garage. The defendant agreed to allow the car to remain in his yard without charge, and when the plaintiff returned two or three weeks later to say that she could not take the car away and had no idea when she would be able to do so, he said that it was not in his way and that she could leave it there. The car, therefore, remained in the yard. In June or July, 1945, the brewery company owning the Bell Inn, Brackley, converted the outhouses and stables into a garage which they let for the use of the St. John's Ambulance Corps, and, following a communication from one of the directors of the company, the defendant decided that the motor car must be removed. Not knowing the address of the plaintiff or Mr. Proctor, he got in touch with the police at Brackley, the chief constable of Nottingham, and the superintendent of police at Ilkeston in an endeavour to find the whereabouts of Mr. Proctor, but without success. Finding that the car was causing difficulty to the ambulances and other vehicles using the yard, he decided that it must be disposed of. The car had been in the open since its purchase and under a tarpaulin since the plaintiff's departure, and was not roadworthy owing to weather damage, seizing up of various parts, rusting over and the need for renewals. He, therefore, had repairs and renewals carried out at a garage at a cost of £73 5s. 10d., and himself painted the car at a cost of about £12, making a total cost of some £85. On Dec. 10, 1945, he had the car sold by auction by a firm of auctioneers for £105, less agent's commission of £5, leaving him £15 net. On Apr. 10, 1946, the plaintiff called at the inn and, when it transpired that the car had been disposed of, brought proceedings in detinue and conversion. The defendant contended that the plaintiff was not the owner of the car and had not a sufficient interest in it to sue in trover, and that there was no detinue or conversion of the car because he had sold it as an agent of necessity. On this basis he said he was liable only for the proceeds of the sale of the car less expenses necessarily incurred in making it fit for sale, i.e., £100 less £85 or £15. The plaintiff claimed as damages the full value of the car at the date of judgment, which was found to be £120, without any allowance for the expenditure of the defendant on it. The court found for the plaintiff on the issue as to liability, but held that allowance must be made for the expenditure on the car incurred by the defendant in arriving at the amount of damages, and gave judgment for £120 less £85, or £35.

Brassey for the plaintiff.

J. Stirling for the defendant.

LYNSKEY, J.: In this case the plaintiff is claiming from the defendant the return of a 16 h.p. motor car, the property of the plaintiff, which, she says, is worth £200. Her first claim is in detinue, alleging that the defendant has wrongfully detained this car, and her second claim, in the alternative, is for conversion. The defence put forward is threefold. First, it is denied that the plaintiff was the owner of the car. Secondly, it is said that, if she were, there was no detention and no conversion because the defendant sold the car in December, 1945, as an agent of necessity and is willing to account to the plaintiff for the balance of the price of the car after deducting his expenses for making the car saleable and the cost of sale. The third defence is that, in any event, the defendant is entitled to credit for moneys he has spent on the car as against its present day value or its value at the time of conversion, and that the plaintiff is only entitled to recover the value of the car at the date of conversion after deduction of the moneys which the defendant spent on the car and the value of the work and labour he put into the car to make it saleable.

[HIS LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence and found the facts stated above, and continued:] The first point I have to decide is: Was the plaintiff the owner of this car, or, at any rate, sufficiently entitled to sue in trover? The evidence is that her stepfather bought the car for her, it was registered in her name, and, no doubt, she, together with her stepfather, drove it periodically. The only doubt that is raised about her ownership is the fact that there are three letters written by Mrs. Proctor and signed as if by her husband in which the car is described as his car. One is in answer to an offer of sale by the solicitor, Mr. Lanham, in which the reply written to him is offering the sale of the car. The reply is: "Regarding your letter concerning my S.S. car, I am prepared to take £35 for the same." Mrs. Proctor's evidence is that that letter was really written on behalf of her daughter, although apparently signed by the husband. There are other letters later on when she is making inquiries about the sale of the car. I am satisfied here that the probabilities are, this family living together, that the car was a present by the stepfather to the stepdaughter, but, as so often happens, all three of them more or less regarded the car as the family car, and I am not satisfied it was the stepfather's car in particular. I am satisfied that the car was the daughter's. She was the owner of it, if not in full, at least in part, which would be quite sufficient to entitle her to bring these proceedings, she being entitled to possession of the car.

The second argument is that there was no conversion of the car and there has been no detinue of it because the defendant sold it as agent of necessity for the plaintiff. I have been referred to no case where the doctrine of agent of necessity has been applied to a bailment of this sort. The matter was considered in Sachs v. Miklos (1) where, in the course of his judgment, LORD GODDARD, C.J., says, dealing with this question of agent of necessity ([1948] 1 All E.R. 68):

"The question that arises is whether they had any legal right to sell the furniture. The learned judge held that in the circumstances they became agents of necessity and, therefore, had an implied authority to sell. Counsel for the plaintiff has satisfied me that they cannot possibly be held to be agents of necessity. Agents of necessity, until very modern times, were confined to two classes of persons, those who accepted bills of exchange for the honour of the payee and masters of ships who found themselves in foreign parts and unable to get immediate instructions from their owners when they wanted money for unlooked-for expenses and so forth. They then had power to pledge, sell, or hypothecate the ship, and, in some cases, to deal with the cargo as agents of necessity. As recently as 1895 LORD ESHER in Gwilliam v. Twist (2) expressed considerable doubt whether it was possible to enlarge the classes of person who could be regarded as agents of necessity, but the courts have not found any difficulty in applying the doctrine where a necessity, which means an emergency, has arisen in the case of carriers by land. When it becomes impossible, or commercially impossible, or extraordinarily difficult (as may happen in the case of a strike or breakdown of communications), for a carrier to communicate with the owner of goods, there is no reason why he should not be entitled to sell or dispose of them in the same way as a master of a ship, subject to this, that I know of no case in which the doctrine of the agency of necessity has been applied to carriers by land except where the goods are perishable or where they are in a somewhat similar category, e.g., livestock, which have to be looked after, fed and watered. I think it is clear from the judgment of SCRUTTON, L.J., in Jebara v. Ottoman Bank (3) that the courts should be slow to increase the number of classes of people who can be looked on as agents of necessity. They are selling or disposing of other people's goods without the authority of the owners, and certain it is that they have never been entitled so to act unless there is a real emergency."

I am very doubtful if the doctrine of agent of necessity can be applied to a case of goods stored in premises, but, if it can, it can only be applied in a case of real emergency which necessitates the disposal of the goods. In this case I am not satisfied there was any emergency. The highest it takes the defendant is that after June or July, 1945, the car became something of an inconvenience, not to himself, but to others who might be using the converted stables as garages for the use of their ambulances. I have had no real evidence which shows there was any necessity for the defendant to dispose of this car. He may have found it inconvenient. He may have found it to some degree a nuisance, but that does not mean an emergency which compels him to dispose of it. It could have been left there. I am satisfied there was no real emergency which, if such a doctrine would apply to this case, would justify the sale of this motor car. That means that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the detention, or, alternatively, the conversion of the car.

The next question that arises is: What is the nature of those damages? The plaintiffs, relying on the decision to which I have just referred of Sachs v. Miklos (1) following on the decision of Rosenthal v. Alderton & Sons, Ltd. (4), say they are entitled to the value of the motor car as it is today, i.e., the day on which judgment is given in this action, but I should ignore what its value was at the time of conversion or what its value was in the meantime and ignore the fact that the defendant has spent some money on the car for the purpose of making it saleable. My view is that I have to assess the damages, in view of those two authorities, as at today, but the damages I have to assess are the damages which the plaintiff has suffered by reason of the deprivation of her property or the detention of her property, the detention up to date and deprivation by reason of the fact it cannot now be returned. It seems to me that, in assessing that value, I must have regard to what the defendant has spent in making that vehicle saleable, because otherwise I should be taking the saleable value of something which was not merely the plaintiff's property but somebody else's property in the shape of work or material. In my view, the statement of the law in SALMOND ON TORTS, 10th ed., p. 309, is correct:

"If, on the other hand, the property increases in value after the date of the conversion, a distinction has to be drawn. If the increase is due to the act of the defendant, the plaintiff has no title to it, and his claim is limited to the original value of the chattel. [The passage refers to Reid v. Fairbanks (5) and continues:] If, however, the subsequent increase of value is not due to the act of the defendant, but would have occurred in any case, even had no conversion been committed, the plaintiff is entitled to recover it as special damage resulting from the conversion, in addition to the original value of the property converted: as when goods taken or detained have risen in value by reason of the fluctuation of the market."

That is the measure of damages in conversion.

The measure of damages in detinue, it seems to me, must be similar, if not the same. At any rate, when I am asked to give damages in detinue for the value of a motor car as at today, and I find that a large sum of money has been spent on it for the purpose of making it even saleable, I must take that into account in assessing what is the value of the property the plaintiff has lost. [HIS LORDSHIP considered the evidence as to the value of the car, and continued:] I assess the value of the car today at £120. On that, in my view, the defendant ought to be given credit for producing that result. It is as a result of the £73 he spent in repairs and renewals and as a result of his own expenditure of time, labour and materials in painting and renovating the outside of the car that that price was realisable at all. If he had not spent that money, I am quite satisfied this car would probably have realised today something in the nature of £20 or £25 as scrap. The result is that the defendant is entitled to credit, not from the point of view of payment for what he has done, but in order to arrive at what is the true value of the property which the plaintiff has lost. In my view, the value of the property which the plaintiff has lost is approximately £35, and there will be judgment for that amount.

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs on county court scale C.

Solicitors: Gibson & Weldon, agents for F. G. & P. M. Robinson, Ilkeston (for the plaintiff); Torr & Co., agents for Barnes & Lanham, Brackley, Northants (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

EVON AND ANOTHER v. NOBLE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Birkett, J.), November 10, 11, 1948.]

Evidence—Admissibility—Statement in document—"Person interested"—Domestic servant—In charge of employer's child—Injury to child—Action for negligence against person alleged to have caused injury—Evidence Act, 1938 (c. 28), s. 1 (1) (3).

In the absence of her mother a child had been left in charge of a domestic servant. While playing, the child sustained injuries to her mouth, face and right eye which were alleged to be due to the negligence of a chemist leaving acid in a glass container in a yard or wash-house to which the child had access. After the writ in an action for negligence against the chemist had been issued, the servant made a written statement with regard to the accident, and at the date of the hearing she could not be traced.

HELD: the domestic servant being in charge of the child and her reputation for care in minding a child being in issue, she was "a person interested at a time when proceedings were pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish" within the meaning of the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (3), and, therefore, the statement was not admissible in evidence.

Dicta of MORTON, J., in Plomien Fuel Economiser Co., Ltd. v. National Marketing Co. ([1941] 1 All E.R. 314; [1941] Ch. 251; 165 L.T. 120), considered.

[FOR THE EVIDENCE ACT, 1938, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 31, p. 145.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Bain v. Moss Hutchison Line, Ltd., [1948] 2 All E.R. 294.
- (2) Plomien Fuel Economiser Co., Ltd. v. National Marketing Co., [1941] 1 All E.R. 311; [1941] Ch. 248; 110 L.J.Ch. 180; 165 L.T. 119; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Holton v. Holton, [1946] 2 All E.R. 534; 176 L.T. 186; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Barkaway v. South Wales Transport Co., Ltd., [1948] 2 All E.R. 460.

ACTION for damages for negligence.

The second plaintiff was an infant girl suing by her father and next friend, the first plaintiff. The defendant carried on the business of a chemist at 13, Eastern Esplanade, Southend-on-Sea. The plaintiffs alleged that in or about April, 1946, the defendant orally granted a licence to the mother of the infant plaintiff for herself and her family, including the infant plaintiff, to use the defendant's wash-house, that the licence was never revoked, and that the defendant knew that children habitually used the wash-house. It was, further, alleged that the defendant, his servant or agent, negligently left in the wash-house a glass container filled with acid from the neck of which there hung a rubber tube, and that this constituted a trap for a child of tender years. On May 7, 1946, the infant plaintiff was lawfully in the wash-house and in playing with the rubber tube, caused the escape of a quantity of acid from the container and suffered injuries to her mouth, face and right eye. The defendant did not admit the granting of the licence or that the infant plaintiff was lawfully in the wash-house or communal yard. He denied the allegation that the container was left in the wash-house, and said that it was left in a store at the rear of his shop and that the infant plaintiff's injuries arose from her misconduct in trespassing in the store and unlawfully meddling with the articles stored there. After the writ in the action had been issued, the domestic servant of the first plaintiff, in whose charge, at the time of the accident, the infant plaintiff had been left with instructions "to keep an eye on the children and not to let them cross the road" in the absence of the infant plaintiff's mother, made a written statement with regard to the accident. At the date of the hearing this domestic servant could not be traced, and the plaintiffs sought to put in her written statement under the Evidence Act, 1938, s. 1 (1). BIRKETT, J., rejected the evidence on the ground that the statement was made by a "person interested" within s. 1 (3) of the Act.

T. H. K. Berry for the plaintiffs.

Flowers, K.C., and J. P. Webber for the defendant.

BIRKETT, J.: The immediate point is whether the statement which was made by a Miss Dorothy Bush on June 3, 1947, ought to be admitted as evidence in this action. To be admitted it must conform to the provisions of the Evidence Act, 1938. Section 1 (1) provides :

"In any civil proceedings where direct oral evidence of a fact would be admissible, any statement made by a person in a document and tending to establish that fact shall, on production of the original document, be admissible as evidence of that fact if the following conditions are satisfied . . . (i) if the maker of the statement either—(a) had personal knowledge of the matters dealt with by the statement . . . and (ii) if the maker of the statement is called as a witness in the proceedings: Provided that the condition that the maker of the statement shall be called as a witness need not be satisfied if he is dead, or unfit by reason of his bodily or mental condition to attend as a witness, or if he is beyond the seas and it is not reasonably practicable to secure his attendance, or if all reasonable efforts to find him have been made without success."

It is conceded that Miss Bush had personal knowledge of the matters dealt with by the statement, and I hold that all reasonable efforts have been made to find Miss Bush without success.

Sub-section (3) is of importance. It provides :

"Nothing in this section shall render admissible as evidence any statement made by a person interested at a time when proceedings were pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish."

It is agreed that the statement which is sought to be admitted was made when proceedings were actually pending. The writ had been issued. The only question, therefore, remaining is whether I ought to hold that this lady was a person interested. The authorities on this matter are beginning to increase, but no comprehensive category of persons interested has been made. It has been said that certain persons are clearly not interested and that certain other persons are. In Bain v. Moss Hutchison Line, Ltd. (1) I dealt with the matter on the special facts of that case. In the course of the judgment I referred ([1948] 2 All E.R. 296) to the observations of MORTON, J., in Plomien Fuel

Economiser Co., Ltd. v. National Marketing Co. (2). MORTON, J., said ([1941] 1 All E.R. 314):

"It may be that there are circumstances in which it might be said that a servant of the company was not a person interested. As to that, I express no opinion. However, I think that the general intention of the section is that, if a statement is put in as evidence, to which, of course, no cross-examination can be directed, it should be either a statement made at a time when proceedings are not pending or anticipated involving a dispute as to any fact which the statement might tend to establish or a statement made by what I may perhaps conveniently describe as an independent person."

That reasoning commends itself to me, because one of the great advantages of the trials of actions in our courts is cross-examination. If a party in a dispute is to have a statement put in by the other side to which no cross-examination can be directed, obviously that party labours under a great disability, and, therefore, as MORTON, J., has said, it must always be kept in mind that there can be no cross-examination on a statement so admitted, and it is imperative that the statement must be made by an independent person. I suppose that that really means a person who has no temptation to depart from the truth on one side or the other—a person not swayed by personal interest, but completely detached, judicial, and impartial.

In Holton v. Holton (3), Mr. Clifford Mortimer made a submission to the learned judge who appears to have adopted it without making any comment on it. Mr. Mortimer submitted that the words "person interested" must mean "a person who has a pecuniary or other material interest in the result of the proceedings—a person whose interest is affected by the result of the proceedings, and, therefore, would have a temptation to pervert the truth to serve his personal or private ends. It does not mean an interest in the sense of intellectual observation or an interest purely due to sympathy. It means an interest in the legal sense, which imports something to be gained or lost." Counsel for the defendant drew my attention to Barkaway v. South Wales Transport Co., Ltd. (4). It appears that arising out of a road accident, which, it was said, was caused by a tyre burst, an action was brought for negligence against the appellants, and one Jenkins, a tyre tester and fitter employed by the appellants, gave evidence on their behalf. Subsequently, another action was brought for negligence, but, in the meantime, Jenkins had died. References were made in the second trial to what Jenkins had said in the first, but there was no formal application to use the evidence of Jenkins. When it came to the Court of Appeal it was sought on various grounds to use the transcript of the evidence of Jenkins. In giving judgment on this point, ASQUITH, L.J., said (and SCOTT and BUCKNILL, L.J.J., agreed) that the person who "made" the statement for the purposes of s. 1 (1) of the Evidence Act, 1938, must have been either (a) Jenkins or (b) the person who made the transcript (the reporter). Alternatively (a) was ruled out by s. 1 (4) which provides:

"For the purposes of this section, a statement in a document shall not be deemed to have been made by a person unless the document or the material part thereof was written, made or produced by him with his own hand, or was signed or initialled by him or otherwise recognised by him in writing as one for the accuracy of which he is responsible."

None of the conditions imposed by sub-s. (4) had been fulfilled by Jenkins. The reporter, on the other hand, had made the statement within the definition in sub-s. (4), because he made the transcript with his own hand, but the reporter had to satisfy the condition in sub-s. (1) (b), in other words, he must have made the transcript in performance of a duty to record information supplied to him and Jenkins's evidence was supplied, not to him, but to the court. Furthermore, ASQUITH, L.J., said the transcript must be rejected under sub-s. (3) since Jenkins was a person interested both because his reputation as a tyre tester was involved and because he was interested, as an employee, in his employers winning the case.

Here it is conceded that Miss Bush was a domestic servant employed by the child's parents. On the day in question she had been expressly charged with the care of this little child. What I have to ask myself is: In all the circumstances of this case was Miss Bush a person interested? She was not financially interested. She may have had the interest of sympathy, but that does not affect me in my decision here. I think, however, that in the true sense of the words she was a person interested. She had been left in charge of the child. The child had come to injury, and her reputation for care in minding a child was in issue, just as Jenkins' reputation as a tyre tester was in issue. It is true that MORTON, J., said in Plomien Fuel Economiser, Ltd. v. National Marketing Co. ([1941] 1 All E.R. 314) that it might be that a servant is not a person interested, but in the present case Miss Bush was a "person interested" in that she had been left in charge of this child. The child's safety was her peculiar care, and in that sense her reputation was involved in the result of the action. In all the circumstances, therefore, I shall not admit this statement.

Admission of the statement refused.

Solicitors: H. Flint & Co., agents for Henry Flint, Southend-on-Sea (for the plaintiffs); Sprinz & Sons, agents for Thurlow Baker & Nolan, Southend-on-Sea (for the defendant).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re GILLSON (deceased). ELLIS v. LEADER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Evershed, L.J.J.)
November 8, 9, 10, 1948.]

Will—"All my bloodstock"—Inclusion of half share in horse and interest as member of syndicate owning stallion.

Costs—Appeal to Court of Appeal—Costs of several parties with same interest and same arguments—Allowance of only one set of costs.

By cl. 3 (c) of his will dated Feb. 4, 1943, a testator, who died on Mar. 3, 1944, gave to H. "all my bloodstock." At the date of the will, the testator owned several thoroughbred horses including a colt called Pink Flower. He subsequently sold a half share in Pink Flower to Mrs. H., but the horse remained as part of his stud. The testator was also at the date of the will interested in a stallion called Colombo, which had been purchased on Nov. 1, 1942, by a number of persons including the testator. On Dec. 31, 1942, the purchasers entered into an agreement appointing a committee to act in all matters appertaining to Colombo as agents for the purchasers, and as a result of the agreement the purchasers were entitled to free nominations for mares to be served by Colombo according to the proportion of the purchase price put up. The testator had subscribed one-fortieth share, and was entitled to one free nomination. The testator's stud at all material times included Pink Flower, but never included Colombo.

HELD: on the true construction of the will, the words "all my bloodstock" included the testator's share of Pink Flower, but the testator's interest in Colombo was more in the nature of an investment than an interest in a horse and did not form part of his "bloodstock."

Re Sykes ([1940] 4 All E.R. 10), distinguished.

Per LORD GREENE, M.R.: When an appeal is made to the Court of Appeal and there are several parties in precisely the same interest with precisely the same arguments who below were separately represented, it is the duty of the solicitors concerned to do everything possible to avoid unnecessary costs in the Court of Appeal. If parties with precisely the same argument come to the Court of Appeal and three separate sets of costs are incurred, the practice is to allow only one set of costs, certainly where costs are being charged on residue or on a fund the persons interested in which either are absent or are infants.

[AS TO DESCRIPTIONS OF PROPERTY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., pp. 236-239, paras. 291, 292; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 645-649, Nos. 4852-4893.]

Case referred to :

(1) Re Sykes, Skelton and Dyson v. Sykes, [1940] 4 All E.R. 10; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the defendant, Harvey Leader, from an order of JENKINS, J., dated Apr. 13, 1948, on an originating summons asking whether a half share in a horse and the interest of the testator as a member of a syndicate in a stallion passed under a bequest of "all my bloodstock." JENKINS, J., answered the question in the negative. The Court of Appeal now held that the half share passed, but the interest as a member of a syndicate did not pass. The facts appear in the judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J.

Russell, K.C., and Sir Norman Touche for Harvey Leader, a specific legatee. J. H. A. Sparrow for the executors.

Geoffrey Cross for Edith Christine Gillson and Maurice Dugdale Gillson, the life tenants.

Dunbar for Rose Lawson, residuary legatee.

Blackett-Ord for Judith Gillson, infant residuary legatee.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: SOMERVELL, L.J., will deliver the first judgment.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of JENKINS, J., and it raises a point under a clause of the will of the late Mr. Godfrey Anthony Gillson. The clause which we have to construe and apply is cl. 3 (c), but I will read cl. 3 (b) as well, because that sub-clause contains the first mention of Mr. Harvey Leader, the legatee, and to some extent has been referred to in the argument. Clause 3 provides :

"I bequeath the following specific legacies free of all death duties namely . . . (b) To Lord Willoughby de Broke such one of my foals or yearlings as he shall within three calendar months from my death select and I express the earnest request that he will have the same trained by Mr. Harvey Leader of Denston Hall Newmarket (c) To the said Harvey Leader all my bloodstock (except such foal or yearling if any as shall be selected by Lord Willoughby de Broke) with the request that he will make fitting gifts to his employees and anyone else in the racing world with whom I have been closely associated and who is deserving of such gift but I declare that the foregoing expression of my wishes shall not create any trust or legal obligation even if the same shall be communicated to him in my lifetime."

The will was made on Feb. 4, 1943. At that date the testator was the owner of seven or eight thoroughbred horses, including a bay colt called Pink Flower. The legatee, Mr. Leader, who is a defendant in these proceedings, was at that time, and at all other material times down to the time of the testator's death, in charge of the thoroughbred horses belonging to the testator. After the date of the will, the testator sold a half share in Pink Flower to Mrs. Harvey Leader, the trainer's wife. She sub-sold an eighth part of her share to Mr. Harvey Leader and I think an eighth to a Major Keylock—the exact fractions do not matter. The testator died on Mar. 3, 1944. Pink Flower is one of the horses with which we are concerned, and we are also concerned with an interest or share which the testator had when he made his will in a stallion called Colombo. I will state shortly the position as to Colombo. On Nov. 1, 1942, that stallion was purchased by a number of persons, of whom the testator was one, from a Mr. Allnatt. On Dec. 31, 1942, an agreement was entered into by those purchasers, Mr. Allnatt, who was the vendor, being a party to this agreement and retaining an interest in the stallion. Under the agreement a committee was appointed who were, in all matters arising out of and in connection with the stallion and the enterprise provided for and contemplated by the agreement, to act as a committee and agents for and on behalf of the subscribers. The broad result of the agreement, when it got working, was that the parties to it obtained free nominations for mares to be served by this stallion according to the extent of the money which they had put up for the purchase price. There were forty shares or interests, and the testator had a fortieth share which entitled him to one free nomination. Some of the other parties to the syndicate had two, three or four, and Mr. Allnatt had as many as ten shares.

It is stated in an affidavit that Pink Flower was added to the testator's stud on Mar. 2, 1943. That is not quite consistent with what I think was told us by counsel for Mr. Leader, that he owned Pink Flower at the time of the will, but it is immaterial. The horse has remained in the stud since that date, but the stud did not at any time include Colombo.

There was evidence of the meaning attached to this word "bloodstock" among those who own thoroughbred horses and in what one might describe as the "racing world," to borrow the expression which is used in the clause in the will which we have to construe. Mr. McElligott, a member of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, who has been for ten years a director of the British Bloodstock Agency, says:

"Part ownership of thoroughbred horses is extremely common. The word 'bloodstock' in connection with its owner is in my experience invariably used and understood as including any share or shares he may own in bloodstock horses, and the word 'bloodstock' by itself as referring equally to a share or shares in a bloodstock horse or horses as to a wholly owned bloodstock horse or horses."

In a further affidavit Mr. Jarvis, a trainer of racehorses at Newmarket, says he has trained, owned and bred racehorses for upwards of thirty years, and adds:

"In my life-long experience I have found that part ownership of horses is extremely common and I have in fact been a party to such partnerships and I say no one concerned in the racing and breeding world in referring generally to the bloodstock of an owner would intend to exclude from that phrase his shares in partly owned horses and similarly a person who only owned part interests in horses would be referred to as an owner of bloodstock."

It will now be convenient to refer to counsel's note which we have of the learned judge's judgment. He says that the question turns on the construction of the clause in this will to which I have referred. He then says that there is nothing to show that the testator was using the word "bloodstock" in any other but its ordinary, primary meaning or that he was using it in an extended sense. He then quotes from the NEW OXFORD DICTIONARY the definition of bloodstock as "thoroughbred or pedigree horses collectively," and he proceeds on the basis that if you read that into the will—"all my thoroughbred horses"—it cannot include a horse in which the testator has only a share. He refers to a decision of BENNETT, J., in Re Sykes (1), in which the judge was construing a bequest of "my horses," and decided that those words did not extend to or include the interest which a testator had as tenant in common of a horse. The present case is different from that in two respects. First, we have not got to construe "my horses." We have to construe the expression "all my bloodstock," and we have the evidence to which I have referred. It is, no doubt, right to say that the primary meaning of words in wills would normally be their proper construction, but, with regard to the word "bloodstock," there is one thing worth noting. It is not disputed that the word has only recently appeared in any dictionary, namely, in the supplement to the NEW OXFORD DICTIONARY. That rather surprised me, as it seemed to me to be a word with which one was reasonably familiar, but that fact has this relevance, that the word clearly is one which has not had a long currency in ordinary usage, and I think it is probably true that it is in the main used by those who are interested in thoroughbred horses. The court, of course, is in no sense bound by a dictionary. In normal cases the court is presumed to know the English language, though it is not unusual to seek assistance from dictionaries. I think myself that the conclusion from the evidence is that among those interested in thoroughbred horses the word "bloodstock," used in connection with an owner, has a meaning which, without being precise, covers, or in many ordinary contexts is used as covering, a share in a horse as distinct from full ownership. That the testator was familiar with that meaning is plain from what appears from the evidence as to his position as the owner of thoroughbred horses, and I think it is also relevant to note that in the sub-clause which we have to construe the owner of thoroughbred horses was making a bequest to a trainer of thoroughbred horses.

The case put forward was that both the testator's share in Pink Flower and his share in Colombo passed under the expression "all my bloodstock." I draw a distinction between the two. The facts in the case of Pink Flower are that he parted with a half share in this horse. The horse remained as part of his stud, trained by his trainer with his other horses. I think, having regard to those facts, the expression "all my bloodstock" covers his share in Pink Flower. I do not, however, think that the evidence goes so far as to make it right for the court to say that the expression "all my bloodstock" must be construed as including any share or interest, whatever its nature, that the testator had in any thoroughbred horse. With regard to Colombo, in the first place, though that might not in itself be conclusive, the horse was not with the testator's horses at his stud nor was the horse in the care of his trainer. I am also influenced by the fact that under this agreement, though it was entered into after the purchase, the parties had rights different from those which arise in the simple case when two people each have, say, a half share in a horse. The rights are of a somewhat complicated kind. The stallion is managed by a committee. The parties to what is called the syndicate contribute to the expenses and they each have this right of free nomination. It is much more in the nature of an investment. The right to nominate can, presumably, be bought and sold, and it is just worth noting that in the copy of SPORTING LIFE, which was exhibited on another point, under the heading "Bloodstock" there is this advertisement: "One share in Colombo syndicate for sale," i.e., it is described as a share in a syndicate rather than a share in a horse simpliciter. Having regard to all those facts and giving full and proper weight to the evidence, I cannot come to the conclusion that this share in Colombo is covered by the words which we have to construe, "all my bloodstock." For these reasons, I think the proper order to make will be one by which the share in Pink Flower passes under the bequest but the interest in Colombo does not.

EVERSHED, L.J.: I agree. The question for the decision of the court is the familiar one: What did the testator intend by the words he used in para. (c) of his will, particularly, the phrase "my bloodstock" ? It is, I think, conceded on all hands that the court, in construing the words, is bound to pay regard to the circumstances as they existed at the testator's death with a view to seeing on what subject-matter the words could operate. It has been said that we ought not to pay regard to other evidence on which counsel for Mr. Leader rely in regard to the use of the word "bloodstock" in those circles which have been referred to by SOMERVELL, L.J., as "the racing world." I do not think that is right. It seems to me that, for the reasons which SOMERVELL, L.J., has fully canvassed, we are here entitled, if not bound, to take that evidence into account. Whatever one might suppose etymologically the word might mean, it is, in fact, only applied to horses, and in that sense the word may well, in many contexts, when used in connection with an owner, be correctly used (that is to say, so as to be understood) to include part shares in horses, it being remembered also that it is proved to be a common feature of "the racing world" that valuable pedigree or thoroughbred horses are owned in shares by more than one person. When all those facts are taken into account and the language used by the testator falls to be construed, it seems to me that there is here a proper distinction to be drawn between the case of Pink Flower and the case of Colombo. JENKINS, J., I think, found that his mind revolted at the conception that this phrase was such as to cover both the interests in Pink Flower and in Colombo. The suggested interpretation of the words which counsel for Mr. Leader put was "all my property, bloodstock in quality." As I read the learned judge's judgment, he felt that, if that were right, it would cover all sorts of interests too far removed from the sense of the language in para. 3 (c). If it were necessary to treat the words either as covering the testator's interests both in Pink Flower and Colombo or as covering neither, I should have followed the learned judge's view, but, as I have indicated, it seems to me that, on the facts, there should be drawn a distinction between the two cases. It appears to me that Major Gillson could properly be said as regards Pink Flower to be a racehorse owner, and in the racing world he, being a part owner of the horse, it would be proper to say, at any rate in some contexts, that his interest in the horse was comprised in the phrase "my bloodstock." When the other facts to which SOMERVELL, L.J., has referred are taken into account, I conclude that the phrase in this will was intended to cover and does cover his interest in that horse. When, however, one regards the facts relating to Colombo, the case seems to me to be different. True, the subject-matter of the syndicate happened to be a racehorse, but that was relatively incidental. In my view, without attempting to define the line between the two, one can say that in the one case the testator remained in truth the owner of a racehorse so as to bring his share in it within the words "my bloodstock," but in the other case he was really a participant in a commercial syndicate, a kind of interest which could not properly be covered by the phrase "my bloodstock." For these reasons I agree that a distinction should be drawn, and to that extent that counsel for Mr. Leader is entitled to succeed.

LORD GREENE, M.R.: I shall not be thought disrespectful to the learned judge if I confine my remarks to one small point, because I am in entire agreement with what has been said by my brethren. The small point which I think is just worth mentioning relates to the case of Colombo. My brethren have said that the Colombo matter must be looked on rather as an investment in a syndicate. I think some further weight is given to that view when the structure of the agreement and the nature of the syndicate are looked at, which is not, I think, without importance. Shares in the syndicate are forty in number. The highest number of services which the stallion is to give under the agreement is the usual number of forty. The agreement does not deal with any other kind of exploitation of the stallion save sharing out those forty

A nominations among the forty shares in the syndicate. Therefore, looking at the substance of the transaction, each person who put his money into this enterprise was getting out of it, in effect, not a share of a racehorse but a right to nominate, and nothing more. It is clear on the face of it that that is the substantial value of such an interest in such a syndicate. That appears to me to add force to the view that my brethren have taken as to the purely investment nature of that particular transaction. The result will be that the order of the learned judge must be varied.

Argument as to costs followed.

B LORD GREENE, M.R.: I think it is right that I should repeat what has been said many times, that when appeals are brought to this court and there are several parties with precisely the same interest and precisely the same arguments who below may have been separately represented, it is the duty of the solicitors concerned to do everything possible to avoid unnecessary costs in this court. In the present case I can see no reason why, with a little good will and with a desire to avoid multiplication of costs, one set of costs only should have been incurred. Parties with precisely the same argument come up to this court and three separate sets of costs are incurred. The practice, C in my experience, always was in such a case to allow only one set of costs, certainly where costs are being charged on residue, for instance, or on a fund the persons interested in which either are absent or are infants and, therefore, are not in a position to consent. In the present case the appeal has succeeded substantially, and we think that it is a proper case for the appellants' costs as between solicitor and client to be paid out of the estate. Similarly, the costs D of the trustees, who are necessary parties in this court, should be paid as between solicitor and client out of the estate. For the other respondents there will be one set of costs only as between solicitor and client which likewise will be paid out of the estate. The way in which that one set of costs will be treated will, of course, be a matter for the taxing master in the usual way.

Appeal allowed. Order of JENKINS, J., varied accordingly.

E Solicitors: Ward, Bowie & Co., agents for Rustons & Lloyd, Newmarket (for Mr. Harvey Leader); Ellis, Peirs & Co. (for the executors and a residuary legatee); May, May & Deacon (for the life tenants); Lovell, White & King (for the infant residuary legatee).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

F

Re BIDIE (deceased). BIDIE v. GENERAL ACCIDENT, FIRE AND LIFE ASSURANCE CORPORATION, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Greene, M.R., Somervell and Evershed, L.JJ.), November 10, 11, 1948.]

G Family Provision—Time for application—Lost will—Grant of letters of administration—Will found—Revocation of grant—Grant of probate—Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938 (c. 45), s. 2 (1).

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Separation order—Arrears—Recovery—Claim by widow to recover against estate of husband—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), ss. 5 (c), 9.

H

On Dec. 17, 1923, a separation order was made by justices under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 5 (a), on the ground of the husband's persistent cruelty, and under s. 5 (c) the husband was ordered to pay the wife £2 a week. Section 9 of the Act provides that such payment "may be enforced in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation," in effect, by distress and committal. The husband made some payments under the order down to 1928, but he then disappeared and the wife received no further payments.

On Jan. 16, 1945, the husband died. The wife claimed against his estate for arrears of maintenance.

HELD: (i) the wife's claim, as a creditor of the husband's estate, to arrears of maintenance under the order of 1923 failed.

(ii) nor could the wife claim against the husband's estate for sums which she ought to have received during his life in respect of his common law liability to maintain her or in respect of any equitable right of her so to be maintained.

Decision of JENKINS, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 885; [1948] Ch. 697), affirmed.

The Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, s. 2 (1) provides: "... an order under this Act shall not be made save on an application made within 6 months from the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate for general purposes is first taken out."

A testator, who made a will dated Feb. 10, 1937, died on Jan. 16, 1945. The will was not found, and on Apr. 13, 1945, on the assumption that the testator had died intestate, a full grant of administration was made to the widow and one of her children. When the will was discovered the grant of administration was revoked, and on Sept. 7, 1946, a grant of probate was made to the executor named in the will, which made no provision for the widow. On Jan. 8, 1947, a summons was issued by the widow claiming that some provision should be made for her under the Act of 1938:—

HELD: the widow's claim could be considered, since her application was made within 6 months from the date of the grant of probate, though more than 6 months from the date of the grant of administration.

Decision of JENKINS, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 885; [1948] Ch. 697), reversed.

[FOR THE INHERITANCE (FAMILY PROVISION) ACT, 1938, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 31, p. 149.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Hedderwick, [1933] Ch. 669; 102 L.J.Ch. 193; 149 L.T. 188; Digest Supp.
- (2) Re Woolgar, [1942] 1 All E.R. 583; [1942] Ch. 318; 111 L.J.Ch. 209; 167 L.T. 60; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of JENKINS, J., dated Apr. 19, 1948, and reported [1948] 1 All E.R. 885.

The plaintiff, the widow of the testator, claimed against his estate for arrears of maintenance payable to her under a separation order made by justices. JENKINS, J., held that her claim failed and the Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision on this point. The plaintiff also applied under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, that such provision as the court thought fit should be made for her maintenance out of the testator's estate, on the ground that the will made no provision for her. JENKINS, J., held that her claim was barred under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1938 as it was not made within 6 months of the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate for general purposes was first taken out, but an appeal by the plaintiff to the Court of Appeal was now allowed. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R.

Pennycuik, K.C., and Mulligan for the widow.

B. S. Tatham for the executors.

J. H. A. Sparrow, and Lodge for the second and third defendants (residuary legatees).

LORD GREENE, M.R.: The arguments in this case have not led me to think that the learned judge's judgment on the question of arrears of maintenance is in any respect inaccurate. It will be no disrespect to those arguments if I say that I agree with his judgment and am content to adopt it as my own. There is only one point which requires mentioning, and that is the reference to the Matrimonial Causes Rules, r. 62. It was suggested by counsel for the plaintiff that Re Hedderwick (1) and Re Woolgar (2) were wrongly decided in view of that rule. It is worth noticing that in neither case was any suggestion made that r. 62 affected the matter at all. In Re Hedderwick (1) counsel did not, apparently, think it worth referring to, and in Re Woolgar (2) it was referred to, not as governing the case, but on the assumption that it did not govern the case and that its effect had been altered by a later rule, r. 81. I might also say that those rules do not apply to the present case, which has nothing to do with the Matrimonial Causes Rules. As a result, the appeal on this particular point, in my opinion, fails.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree.

EVERSHED, L.J. : I agree.

Appeal on question of arrears of maintenance dismissed.

LORD GREENE, M.R. : The second part of the appeal relates to that part of the application before JENKINS, J., which asked for relief under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938. The plaintiff is the widow of the testator, and the learned judge came to the conclusion that, on the true construction of the relevant provisions of the Act, she was excluded from having any right to obtain relief by the operation of what I may call the limitation section in the Act.

The testator died on Jan. 16, 1945. He made a will dated Feb. 10, 1937, leaving his estate to his two natural children, the second and third defendants. The will, therefore, was one which did not make any provision for the maintenance of the widow, and, subject to the widow being able to satisfy the court under s. 1 (1) of the Act that no reasonable provision for her maintenance was made, the court could make an order in her favour directing that such reasonable provision as the court should think fit should be made out of the testator's net estate for her maintenance. If that will had been proved in the ordinary way, the widow unquestionably would have had a locus standi to apply for relief, and, subject to her being able to satisfy the court on the relevant matters, would have been entitled to an appropriate order. She is clearly a person who prima facie belongs to the class of dependants which the Act was designed to help. The Act is described in its title as "An Act to amend the law relating to testamentary dispositions . . ." It is concerned, and concerned only, with testamentary dispositions. The Act does not seek to amend the law relating to the distribution of intestates' estates. The legislature obviously was of opinion that the class of dependants named in the Act was sufficiently provided for by the existing law in the case of an intestacy. It, therefore, set itself to deal only with the case where, by his testamentary disposition, a testator has displaced the succession which would have taken place if he had died intestate. The Act, as its basis and as the only circumstance in which it can have any operation at all, takes the existence of a will that does not make reasonable provision for the class of dependants named.

When the testator died no one knew that he had made a will, and on that footing the widow would have been entitled to such rights as are given to her by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925. She and one of the children of the testator took out letters of administration on Apr. 13, 1945. Some time after that a will was discovered. It is not suggested that it was anyone's fault that it was not discovered before. As a result probate was granted on Sept. 7, 1946. This summons was taken out on Jan. 8, 1947, i.e., within 6 months from the grant of probate, but after the expiration of about a year and three-quarters from the grant of letters of administration. It is to be observed that it was not competent for the widow to make any application under the Act, and as a result it was not competent for the court to make any order under the Act, until the will was proved. The will was not proved until after the expiration of 15 months from the grant of the letters of administration. During the whole of that time, therefore, it was not competent for the widow to ask for or to obtain any of the relief which the Act sets out to give.

It is said that the result of the circumstances to which I have referred is to deprive the widow for ever of any opportunity of applying to the court for any kind of relief under the Act. It is to be observed that, if that is the effect of the language used, it is for this court to give effect to it, even though it thinks the result capricious or unjust. The capriciousness or injustice of a particular result is a matter to which the court can pay attention in deciding what is the true construction of the words used, but too much weight must not be given to those matters. It is the right of the legislature, if it so wishes, to be capricious or unjust. Indeed, the legislature may know more than the court knows, and what appears unjust or capricious to the court may not appear capricious or unjust to the legislature which, presumably, has a broader knowledge of the facts. I, therefore, do not attach in this case any particular weight to what might be thought to be injustice or capriciousness. I will confine my remarks to pure matters of construction of the relevant words in their context.

I turn at once to what I have called the limitation section in the Act, s. 2 (1). It is as follows :

“ . . . an order under this Act shall not be made save on an application made within 6 months from the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate for general purposes is first taken out.”

It is argued on behalf of the defendants, and the learned judge so held, that the word “representation” is to be given its widest meaning as including, not merely the grant of probate, but also the grant of letters of administration. The learned judge found it possible to put that construction on it notwithstanding the fact that, by construing the word “representation” as including a grant of letters of administration, it would be impossible for a widow in the case of an after-discovered will ever to get any relief at all if the letters of administration remained on foot for the period of 6 months. The learned judge arrived at that conclusion with regret. I myself would share his regret if I felt constrained to put on it the same construction as he did.

The first thing one has to do, I venture to think, in construing words in a section of an Act of Parliament is not to take those words in vacuo, so to speak, and attribute to them what is sometimes called their natural or ordinary meaning. Few words in the English language have a natural or ordinary meaning in the sense that they must be so read that their meaning is entirely independent of their context. The method of construing statutes that I prefer is not to take particular words and attribute to them a sort of prima facie meaning which you may have to displace or modify. It is to read the statute as a whole and ask oneself the question : “In this state, in this context, relating to this subject-matter, what is the true meaning of that word ?” In the present case, if I might respectfully make a criticism of the learned judge's method of approach, I think he attributed too much force to what I may call the abstract or unconditional meaning of the word “representation.” No doubt, in certain contexts, “representation” would be sufficient to cover not merely probate and not merely letters of administration with the will annexed, but administration simpliciter. The real question which we have to decide is : What does the word mean in the context in which we find it here, both in the immediate context of the sub-section in which the word occurs and in the general context of the Act, having regard to the declared intention of the Act and the obvious evil that it is designed to remedy ?

Looking at the general context of the Act, I think these observations are relevant. First, it is limited to the case where there are testamentary dispositions. No order can be made, no order can be applied for, unless a will is produced, and under the rules made to govern the administration of this Act by the courts, production of probate or of letters of administration with the will annexed is compulsory before the court can make an order [R.S.C., Ord. 54F, r. 13 (1)]. Indeed, under the Act itself [s. 3 (3)] any order that the court may make must be transmitted to the Probate Registry that it may be annexed to one or other of those two documents, whichever happens to be the one in the case. That being the general object of the Act, when I find the word "representation" in what I may call the limitation section, I ask myself, broadly in the first instance, what sort of representation must be meant. The relevant "representation" under the general scheme of the Act is that representation, I should have thought, the granting of which gives the court jurisdiction to apply the provisions of the Act. It must be limited to the case of probate or letters of administration with the will annexed, because it is only when there is a will that the court has any power to do anything. That seems to me to be a legitimate way of approaching the word "representation" in s. 2 (1) on broad lines, but there is more in it than that, because, when I come to the immediate context, I find expressions which satisfy me that the word "representation" cannot have been intended by the legislature to extend to anything but what I have called the relevant representation for the purposes of the Act, i.e., a representation under a probate or letters of administration with the will annexed. I will read s. 2 (1) again :

" . . . an order under this Act shall not be made save on an application made within 6 months from the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate for general purposes is first taken out."

That language appears to me to assume clearly—if, indeed, it does not affirm—that the period of 6 months which is being spoken of is a period during which an application may be made. It is contemplating a period of 6 months during which an application may be made. If that period is allowed to elapse, no application can be made thereafter. I cannot read those words as contemplating that the period of 6 months referred to would be, so to speak, a dead period during which no application could possibly be made.

If I may make one further respectful criticism of the learned judge's approach, he appears to have laid too much emphasis on the bare word "representation" and too little emphasis on the preceding words, "shall not be made save on an application made within 6 months from the date" of the representation. Reading the whole of the sentence, it seems to me it can only be understood as assuming that 6 months is not a dead period but a live period. I suggested to counsel for the second defendant that, if the section had said "application may be made within 6 months from the date on which representation is first taken out," the word "representation" could not possibly have been construed as extending to a mere grant of letters of administration, and I think he agreed—indeed, I think he would have had to agree. Although the section is not actually drafted in that form, it is, as it seems to me, drafted on similar lines. There is another phrase to which the learned judge did not attach any particular importance, but which strikes me as being confirmatory of that view. The representation dealt with by s. 2 (1) is a representation "in regard to the testator's estate." The sub-section assumes, in my view, that during the whole of the 6 months there will be in existence something which during that period can be called a "testator's estate," but while letters of administration are ruling and before they have been displaced by a subsequent grant of probate it seems to me impossible to predicate of the deceased that he is a "testator." The way in which this argument is avoided, or attempted to be avoided, is by saying that the discovery of the subsequent will and the grant of probate of that will ex post facto (so to speak) attached to him the quality of being a testator, and, therefore, the effect of the subsequent grant of probate is that during the whole of the 6 months he was, in fact, a testator because he had left a will. I myself find great difficulty in reading those words in that rather artificial sense. It seems to me that, as the existence of a will and the failure of the testator in that will to make provision for the dependant is the whole basis and substratum of the Act, the words assume that during the 6 months limitation period there will be in existence a "testator's estate." During that period here there was not an estate which could in law be described as a "testator's estate"—I say this advisedly, because I do not think any court could describe as a "testator" a person in respect of whom there has been a grant of letters of administration which has not been displaced; he would not be a "testator" and it would not be true to say that during that period he was a "testator" within the meaning of s. 2 (1). I find myself with all respect to the learned judge, in no real difficulty in the construction of these words.

There is one further point of a general nature that I might make. As I have said, the widow prima facie falls within the class of person entitled to ask for an order under the Act. The effect of this limitation section is not to take her out of that class of person. It deals with people who are, it is assumed, within that class of person but are excluded from the benefit of the Act if they allow a certain time to elapse. I can well understand the good sense, in an Act of this kind, of putting a limitation section in the Act, but, if this section has the effect contended for by the defendants, it would have what is, I think, the strange effect, in relation to limitation sections, of making the period of limitation run during a time when a person intending to make an application cannot possibly make it. The right to make an application never arose during the 6 months period, and the result of the learned judge's construction would be to construe this limitation section as applying not to a person who has been dilatory in enforcing a right but to a person who never had the chance of enforcing it at all. The legislature may intend such things, of course, and I give full weight to the sort of broad suggestion that certainty is a desirable thing and that it is not really fair to disturb people who have mapped out their lives, possibly, on a particular basis, but, giving full effect to that, it appears to me that one must remember that, talking of hardship, the whole Act is on the footing that a particular limited class of dependant has suffered hardship because a testator has not made the provision which the legislature thinks ought reasonably to be made. It is, therefore, dealing with people who suffer a hardship, and the effect of this limitation section would be to deprive such people of a remedy, notwithstanding the fact that they never had any chance of applying for it.

The learned judge found ([1948] 1 All E.R. 891) that the construction argued for by counsel for the widow lacked logic. He visualised the case where there was a will and probate and then more than 6 months afterwards another will was found and the probate of the first will was revoked, and he asked what happened to the 6 months limitation period in such a case. He formed the view, apparently, that in such a case the limitation period would run from the representation granted in respect of the first will, and he thought it illogical to say that where the earliest representation is not a will but letters of administration a similar result would not follow. With all respect to the learned judge, I do not agree with this reasoning. The case of the two wills was not the case before him. Different considerations may or may not apply to the case of two wills, and it will be time to deal with that problem if and when it arises. There is a fundamental difference between the two cases, and I must not be taken to be suggesting anything one way or the other as to what I would think the proper way of dealing with the case of the two wills. I am merely pointing out a difference between that case and this case. It is this. In the case of letters of administration there is no possibility whatsoever of making an application under the Act. Where there has been probate, there is a possibility of making an application so long as the will stands. Different considerations, therefore, may well apply. I say nothing more about that. I propose to decide this case on the exact question raised before us and the considerations which appear to me to be relevant to this question.

Another matter to which I wish to refer was a point made by the learned judge ([1948] 1 All E.R. 892) on s. 3 (3). That is a procedural section, and it reads as follows :

“ An office copy of every order made under this Act shall be sent to the Principal Probate Registry for entry and filing, and a memorandum of the order shall be indorsed on, or permanently annexed to, the probate of the will of the testator or the letters of administration with the will annexed, as the case may be.”

I am bound to say that, when I first read that sub-section, I thought it supported the argument of the widow. The learned judge read it in the opposite way. He found that it confirmed the view that he himself had formed, and this, I think, was his reason. He said :

“ In s. 2 (1) the legislature has used the general phrase ‘ representation.’ It could have said ‘ probate ’ or ‘ letters of administration with the will annexed.’ It did not do so, but when it wishes to refer to those documents, it does so in terms, as you find it doing in s. 3 (3).”

With all respect to the learned judge, I cannot attach the weight that he did to the circumstance that the two documents are mentioned in s. 3 (3). The scope of s. 2 (1) and that of s. 3 (3) are quite different. Section 3 (3) is a procedural section, directing that any order made under the Act is to be annexed to something. Obviously, it has to go on to say to what it is to be annexed. It was to be annexed, not to the office chair or to some other document in the office, but to whichever of the relevant documents was the one material in the case, which would be probate in the one case, or letters of administration with the will annexed in the other. Therefore, the legislature could not help referring to those two documents in that sub-section. Nothing of the kind was necessary in s. 2 (1), and, therefore, the fact that the legislature in s. 3 (3) did refer to those documents does not appear to me really to carry the weight which the learned judge attaches to it.

I think I have dealt with all the points, and, with the utmost deference to the contrary view of the learned judge, I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. The point was taken, I may say, as a preliminary point, and the learned judge, accordingly, did not deal with the substance of the application, and the case will have to go back to the Chancery Division in order that it may be dealt with.

SOMERVELL, L.J. : I agree that this appeal should be allowed, and I desire to add nothing to what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has already said with regard to the general principles of construction which should guide the courts in dealing with a question of this kind. I would, however, like to state quite briefly the process of reasoning and my effort to apply those principles to this particular subject-matter, which have led me to the conclusion to which I have come.

The general scheme of this Act can be very shortly stated. It assumes that a person has died, having made a will which does not make reasonable provision for the wife or husband or other dependants as set out in the Act. In those circumstances it entitles any one of those persons to apply to the court, and it gives the court jurisdiction to make an order directing such reasonable provision as the court thinks fit to be made out of the testator's net estate.

It is in the context of that scheme that the court has to construe the words of s. 2 (1). The controversy turns round the word "representation." As it seems to me, having regard to the subject-matter of that sub-section, which is in the nature of a limitation on the period during which an application can be made, the "representation" which is there referred to is the representation in respect of the will (which must necessarily have been proved) which the applicant is seeking to attack, or, in other words, a representation in respect of the will the proof of which is the condition precedent for the court's jurisdiction to make the order which is being applied for. If that is right, I base my conclusion less on the fact that when the letters of administration were taken out there was no will known to be in existence and the court was proceeding on the basis that the husband had died intestate—less on the absence of the will at that initial date—than on the fact that that date was not the date of first representation in respect of the will which the applicant in question is seeking to attack. I agree with what the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has said that the case with which we have to deal is not that of two wills, and I also agree that the present case has features which would not exist if and when a case of two wills comes up, but I think, though it is not necessary to decide it, that the construction of this Act and the reasons which have led me to my conclusion would probably cover the case of the two wills. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

EVERSHED, L.J.: I also have come to the same conclusion, though I confess I have reached it by steps more uncertain than those of the MASTER OF THE ROLLS and SOMERVELL, L.J. The difficulty which has impressed itself on my mind is this. The question posed by s. 2 (1) is this. Assuming, as the sub-section does, that there is an application before the court, can the court make an order on that particular application? Since there is to be assumed an application before the court, it necessarily follows that at that date there must be a testator, because, unless there was a testator, there could be nobody capable of making an application. The question as regards the presumed application then is: Was it made "within 6 months from the date on which representation in regard to the testator's estate" (that is to say, to the estate of the particular individual who, having been domiciled in England, died leaving any of the classes of person set out in s. 1 and leaving a will) "for general purposes" was first taken out? Without more, it seems to me, particularly having regard to the last seven words, that there is great force in the argument of counsel for the second defendant that those words, according to their ordinary meaning, as read in their context, and having regard to the purpose of that sub-section, lead in the present case to a negative answer, because representation to this testator's estate was first taken out too long ago.

For my part, and for the reasons already indicated, I cannot attach to the two words "testator's estate" a sufficient significance to qualify what seems to me to be the natural meaning of the word "representation," nor should I find sufficient significance alone in the circumstance that this Act is concerned only with testate persons. I have, however, been persuaded to a conclusion in conformity with the conclusions already expressed by the opening words in s. 2 (1):

"... an order ... shall not be made save on an application made within 6 months ..."

As has been pointed out, that sub-section is in its nature a limitation of some right in the widow, laid down in general terms, and its form is remarkable. It does not state, as the side-note would appear to indicate, that an application shall be made within a certain time. It limits the powers of the court to make orders save on certain applications. I have been persuaded that that must necessarily assume that there is a number of applications capable of being dealt with by the courts, but that only on some of them can orders be made, and, in turn, that seems to postulate that during the 6 months referred to it must have been possible to make an application. Once that stage is reached, it seems then to follow that the "representation in regard to the testator's estate" referred to is a representation, as counsel for the widow put it, under the will or under the relevant will.

A I have listened attentively to what SOMERVELL, L.J., has said. Counsel for the second defendant made the point that, in answering this question, inferentially we might have to answer the question: "What about two wills, one superseding the other?" I feel that there is much force in that, because, if it is said that this phrase does not mean what the learned judge felt compelled to hold it did mean, one ought, prima facie at least to have a clear idea in one's mind what it does mean, and, if the right gloss (for it seems to me that there is no escape from the conclusion that we are putting a gloss) on these words is, "under the relevant will," that will cover or comprehend the case of two wills. That case is not before us, and I think it would be wrong, as the MASTER OF THE ROLLS has pointed out, to express a concluded opinion on it, but I follow SOMERVELL, L.J., in saying that it seems to me, as at present advised, that the gloss that one would put would quite likely be found to cover some cases where there were two wills.

C And I have for my part felt the force of the argument that the question of two wills is relevant on the general matter of considering what was the intention of this Act as one observes it from the whole of its terms. I am not sure, if I may say so, that I accept the argument that the learned judge first reached a conclusion on a point which was not before him and then fell back by way of conclusion on the point in the present case. It seems to me that the learned judge was considering what type of case these words were apt to cover, and that it was relevant to consider the two wills case as well as the case of the intestacy plus the will. However that may be, I have, for the reasons which I have briefly given, reached the conclusion that we are able to give effect to the proposition which the learned judge confessed he would like to accede to, though, as I have said, I feel we have added, as we must necessarily, some gloss on these words, and to that extent have embarked, perhaps, upon judicial legislation. I agree in the circumstances that the appeal on this point should succeed.

E Appeal on the question under the Inheritance (Family Provisions) Act, 1938, allowed. Order below reversed. Matter remitted to Chancery Division. Appellant to have one-half of the costs (as between solicitor and client) of the appeal, out of that part of the estate not affected by any order which may be subsequently made. Costs of the first hearing to be in discretion of the judge to whom the matter is remitted. Infant respondents' costs as between solicitor and client so far as available to be paid out of any residue remaining unaffected by any order the court may make. Executors' costs here and below to be paid as between solicitor and client out of the estate as a whole before any order is made.

G Solicitors: F. Duke & Sons (for the widow); Henry Boustred & Sons (for the executors); A. J. Adams & Adams, agents for R. L. Frank & Co., Truro (for the second defendant); W. R. Perkins, agent for Nelson L. Mitchell, Southend-on-Sea (for the third defendant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re GEORGE'S WILL TRUSTS. BARCLAYS BANK LTD.
v. GEORGE.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Jenkins, J.), October 28, November 11, 1948.]

Ademption—Portion—Double portions—Rebuttal of presumption—Difference in character of gifts—Liabilities undertaken by donee at time of gift inter vivos—Quid pro quo for liabilities—Donor compelled to make gift.

The testator, a farmer, by his will, dated July 22, 1940, after making certain pecuniary and specific bequests and devises, gave his residuary estate to trustees on trust for sale and conversion and to pay the net proceeds as to one-third thereof to his son Robert and as to two-thirds to his son Ernest absolutely. By cl. 7 he provided: "If [Ernest] shall within one month from the date of my death give notice to my trustees in writing that he desires to carry on my farm at F. then I direct my trustees to cause a valuation to be taken of my residuary estate and I direct that one-third of such valuation shall be deemed to constitute the share of [Robert] in my residuary estate and that two-thirds of such valuation shall be deemed to constitute the share of [Ernest] in my residuary estate and I further direct that in the event of [Ernest] carrying on my said farm . . . then [Robert] shall allow his one-third share of my residuary estate to remain invested in my said farm for the benefit of [Ernest] and such one-third share shall be secured to the said [Robert] by means of a suitable charge on the farm stock or otherwise . . ." There followed provisions for the payment off of the charge. The testator worked two farms at F., Glebe Farm, which was his freehold, and Laurels Farm, which was held under a tenancy agreement in the joint names of the testator and Ernest. In 1941, the county war agricultural committee served notices requiring the testator to vacate both farms owing to their poor condition, and, in consequence, a scheme was drawn up under which (i) the testator gave all the live and dead farming stock on the two farms to Ernest; (ii) the testator was to assign to Ernest his share in the tenancy of Laurels Farm; (iii) the testator was to grant Ernest a tenancy of Glebe Farm at a rent to be agreed; and (iv) the testator was to arrange with his bank to secure to Ernest adequate financial resources to run the farms. The agricultural committee approved the scheme. On Mar. 25, 1941, Ernest, who had been employed on the farms all his working life, took control accordingly, and at that date the live and dead farming stock was valued at £2,060 17s. 3d. On Sept. 4, 1942, the testator died. Ernest gave notice under cl. 7 of the will, and surrendered his tenancy of Laurels Farm.

HELD: (i) the gift inter vivos of the farming stock to Ernest was sufficiently ejusdem generis with the testamentary provision to prevent the exclusion or rebuttal of the presumption against double portions by reason of the difference in character of the two gifts, but, if that were not so, the difference in character was rendered immaterial by the circumstance that the live and dead stock was valued at the time of the gift inter vivos at £2,060 17s. 3d., and, could, therefore, be regarded as a gift of money.

Re Jacques ([1903] 1 Ch. 267; 88 L.T. 210), applied.

(ii) the fact that Ernest undertook certain liabilities at the time of the gift inter vivos did not prevent the gift from being a portion. He had, in fact, received a fair quid pro quo for the liabilities which he undertook, and, in any event, a liability attaching to a gift was only a matter to be considered in evaluating the gift, and did not change its character as such.

Dictum of NORTH, J., in Re Vickers (1888) (37 Ch.D. 535; 58 L.T. 922), applied.

(iii) although the testator would not have made the gift inter vivos to Ernest but for the attitude of the agricultural committee, the gift was none the less in the nature of a portion because the testator had, in effect, simply anticipated the testamentary gift.

Re Vaux ([1938] 4 All E.R. 703; [1939] Ch. 465; 160 L.T. 74), considered.

A [AS TO SATISFACTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 161-175, paras. 147-160; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 20, pp. 449-463, Nos. 1743-1889.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Re Vaux, [1938] 4 All E.R. 297, 703; [1939] Ch. 465; 108 L.J.Ch. 60, 211; 160 L.T. 65, 74; Digest Supp.
- B (2) Re Lacon, [1891] 2 Ch. 482; 60 L.J.Ch. 403; 64 L.T. 429; 20 Digest 453, 1770.
- (3) Taylor v. Taylor, (1875), L.R. 20 Eq. 155; 44 L.J.Ch. 718; 20 Digest 458, 1825.
- (4) Re Tussaud's Estate, (1878), 9 Ch.D. 363; 47 L.J.Ch. 849; 39 L.T. 113; 20 Digest 475, 2016.
- C (5) Re Jaques, [1903] 1 Ch. 267; 72 L.J.Ch. 197; 88 L.T. 210; 20 Digest 472, 1982.
- (6) Re Vickers, (1888), 37 Ch.D. 525; 57 L.J.Ch. 738; 58 L.T. 920; 20 Digest 472, 1981.
- (7) Re Scott, [1903] 1 Ch. 1; 72 L.J.Ch. 20; 87 L.T. 574; 20 Digest 459, 1840.

D ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether a gift inter vivos of farm stock adeemed pro tanto a gift by will of a share of the proceeds of sale of the donor's residuary estate with an option to carry on the donor's farm. JENKINS, J., held that the testamentary gift was so adeemed.

Lightman for the plaintiffs, trustees of the will.

E Plowman for the first defendant, Ernest.

Ian Campbell for the second defendant, Robert.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 11. JENKINS, J., read the following judgment. The testator in this case was a farmer. He had two sons, the defendants, Augustine Ernest Maltus George and Robert Ormuz George, whom I will call "Ernest" and

F "Robert" respectively. At the date of his will, the testator was farming two properties at Farthinghoe in Northamptonshire, namely, the Glebe Farm, which was his own freehold, and the Laurels Farm, which was held under a tenancy agreement in the joint names of himself and Ernest. It appears that Ernest had all his working life been employed in the testator's farming business, while Robert had for many years been employed at a branch of Barclays Bank,

G Ltd. The question which I have to decide is in substance whether a gift of the live and dead stock on the two farms made by the testator to Ernest after the date of his will should be brought into account by Ernest in the division of the testator's residuary estate between Ernest and Robert under the rule commonly called the rule against double portions.

By his will dated July 22, 1940 (so far as material for the present purpose)

H the testator appointed the plaintiffs, Barclays Bank, Ltd., and James Black, to be executors and trustees thereof and after making various pecuniary and specific gifts, including a gift of two cottages to Robert subject to a stipulation to the effect that Gladys Laura Russell (who had been the testator's housekeeper for many years) was to be allowed to occupy one of them rent free for a period of five years to be computed from the end of the period of three months thereinafter mentioned, by cl. 6 devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to his trustees on trusts of the usual character for sale, calling in and conversion, and payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts, and to stand possessed of the net residue to pay one-third thereof to Robert for his sole use and benefit absolutely, and to pay the other two-thirds thereof to Ernest for his sole use and benefit absolutely, with a proviso entitling the said Gladys Laura Russell if she so desired to live at the Laurels free of all expense for a period of three months from the date of his death. By cl. 7 the testator gave the following directions which I think I should read in full :

" If the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George shall within one month from the date of my death give notice to my trustees in writing that he desires to carry on my farm at Farthinghoe aforesaid then I direct my trustees to cause a valuation to be taken of my residuary estate and I direct that one-third of such valuation shall be deemed to constitute the share of the said Robert Ormuz George in my residuary estate and that two-thirds of such valuation shall be deemed to constitute the share of the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George in my residuary estate and I further direct that in the event of the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George carrying on my said farm under the provisions of this clause then the said Robert Ormuz George shall allow his one-third share of my residuary estate to remain invested in my said farm for the benefit of the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George and such one-third share shall be secured to the said Robert Ormuz George by means of a suitable charge on the farm stock or otherwise and the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George shall pay the said Robert Ormuz George interest at five per cent. per annum on the value of the one-third share of the said Robert Ormuz George in my residuary estate And I further direct that the said Robert Ormuz George shall allow his one-third share to remain invested in the said farm for a minimum period of three years computed from the date of my death and that after the expiration of such period of three years the said Robert Ormuz George shall be at liberty at any time thereafter to demand repayment to him by the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George of the value of such one-third share and such value shall be reckoned as the value of such one-third share as at the date of the valuation taken by my trustees as aforesaid Provided always that the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George shall be at liberty at any time during the period of three years hereinbefore mentioned to pay to the said Robert Ormuz George the value of such one-third share reckoned as set out above together with interest to the date of such payment and in such event the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George shall be entitled to have such charge or such other security hereinbefore mentioned duly discharged And I direct that in the event of the operation of this clause coming into effect the said Augustine Ernest Maltus George shall allow the said Gladys Laura Russell to live at the Laurels Farthinghoe aforesaid for the period of three months and on the conditions set out in cl. 6 hereof."

The testator died on Sept. 4, 1942, aged 83, and his will was duly proved by the plaintiffs on Apr. 23, 1943. The circumstances in which the testator between the date of his will and the date of his death made the gift to Ernest to which the question now before me relates are fully stated in the affidavit of the plaintiff, James Black. The substance of his evidence is that by the end of 1940 the two farms were in very poor condition primarily owing to the testator's determination, notwithstanding his age, to keep the management of them in his own hands, which made it impossible for Ernest to do anything effective to improve the position ; that, owing to the unsatisfactory state of the farms, the county war agricultural committee in 1940 threatened the testator with ejection from them under the powers conferred on the committee by the emergency legislation then in force, and early in 1941 actually caused notices to be served on him requiring him to vacate both farms ; that, after the service of these notices, the testator and Ernest had an interview with the secretary to the committee, who told them that, unless the farms were thoroughly reorganised, the notices would be enforced; and that at this interview the suggestion was made (Mr. Black does not say by whom, but I infer it was made by the secretary) that it was time the testator retired from active farming and handed over control of the farms to Ernest. Mr. Black goes on to relate how, after the interview with the secretary of the war agricultural committee, the testator consulted his solicitors, Messrs. Barnes and Lanham, and how after a conference between Mr. Lanham of that firm, the testator, Ernest, and the late Mr. Harry Percy Stace, a valuer employed by the testator, the following scheme was drawn up for the purpose of satisfying the committee that there was to be a complete change in the control of the farms and of persuading the committee to withdraw their notices:—(i) The testator was to make a gift of all the live and dead stock on the two farms to Ernest, such gift to be evidenced by a formal deed of gift. (ii) The testator was to assign to Ernest his share in the tenancy of the Laurels Farm. (iii) The testator was to grant to Ernest a tenancy of the Glebe Farm at a rent to be agreed between them and their valuer as a fair rent. (iv) The testator was to make arrangements with his bank to secure adequate financial resources to enable Ernest to finance the farms until such time as he could do without this assistance. This scheme met with the approval of the war agricultural committee, whose concern was to see that the farms were effectively placed under Ernest's management in the interests of efficiency, and documents to carry it out were in due course prepared, with a view to Ernest's assuming control of the farms on Mar. 25, 1941. Ernest did, in fact, take control of the farms and possession of the live and dead stock on or about that date, but, largely owing to delays on the part of the testator, the documents, namely, the assignment to Ernest of the testator's interest in the tenancy of the Laurels Farm, the tenancy agreement by which the Glebe Farm was let to Ernest, and the deed of gift, were not executed until Aug. 25, 1941. The deed of gift was, it appears, never stamped, the original was not produced, and no admissible evidence of it was adduced before me, the copy exhibited to Mr. Black's affidavit being clearly inadmissible as the original was not shown to have been lost or destroyed. However, it was not in dispute that the gift of the live and dead stock was, in fact, made, and that Ernest had assumed possession under such gift some five months before the date on which the deed of gift is said to have been executed.

The live and dead stock was valued at the time of the gift by Mr. Stace at £2,060 17s. 3d., his valuation being dated Mar. 28, 1941. The rent reserved to the testator on the letting of Glebe Farm to Ernest was £172 per annum. It was not suggested before me that this was anything more or less than a fair rent for the property let. Indeed, I assume it to have been the fair rent fixed in consultation with the valuer as contemplated by the scheme. The testator's bank account was overdrawn on Mar. 25, 1941, to the extent of £151 17s. 3d. This account was continued for the purposes of the farms with the result that the overdraft had by August, 1942, been converted into a credit balance of £529 3s. 7d. It was not disputed before me that the payments-in which produced this result could be regarded as wholly attributable to Ernest's farming operations. On Aug. 21, 1942, the credit balance of £529 3s. 7d. was transferred by the testator to an account in Ernest's name.

It appears that after the testator's death Ernest duly gave notice to the testator's trustees of his desire to carry on the testator's farm at Farthinghoe pursuant to cl. 7 of the will, thus bringing the provisions of that clause into operation. It further appears that after the testator's death Ernest, on Apr. 6, 1943, surrendered his tenancy of the Laurels Farm, and on so doing became liable to a claim of £545 or thereabouts for dilapidations as against which he had a claim of £500 or thereabouts for the tenant right. I do not think this surrender and its financial consequences to Ernest have any bearing on the question I have to decide.

In addition to Mr. Black's evidence there are an affidavit by Robert and two affidavits by Ernest. Robert's affidavit and Ernest's first affidavit refer to certain statements alleged to have been made by the testator, which are relied on as direct evidence of the testator's intention that the gift of the live and dead stock to Ernest should (according to Robert) or should not (according to Ernest) be brought into account in the division of the testator's estate. The statements attributed to the testator in these affidavits are in themselves not free from ambiguity, and so far as they can be regarded as tending one way or the other seem to me to cancel each other out, leaving the question at issue to be decided simply by reference to the character of the provision made for the two sons by the testator's will, the character of the gift inter vivos to Ernest, and the circumstances in which that gift was made. Ernest's second affidavit alleges a partnership between himself and the testator, but his counsel agreed before me that this allegation, which is wholly at variance with Mr. Black's evidence, could for the present purpose be disregarded.

I may now proceed to consider whether, on the facts and in the circumstances which I have stated, the rule against double portions applies to the gift of live and dead stock to Ernest, or, perhaps more accurately, whether there is anything in those facts and circumstances to exclude the application of the rule. The principles on which the rule is based and applied are succinctly stated by the present MASTER OF THE ROLLS in Re Vaux (1) ([1939] Ch. 481) where he says :

"The rule against double portions rests upon two hypotheses : first of all, that under the will the testator has provided a portion and, secondly, that by the gift inter vivos which is said to operate in ademption of that portion either wholly or pro tanto, he has again conferred a portion. The conception is that the testator having in his will given to his children that portion of the estate which he decides to give to them, when after making his will he confers upon a child a gift of such a nature as to amount to a portion, then he is not to be presumed to have intended that that child should have both, the gift inter vivos being taken as being on account of the portion given by the will. When the word 'portion' is used in reference to the gift inter vivos, it has a qualitative significance, in this sense, that it is not every gift inter vivos that will cause the rule to come into operation. If a testator gives to a child as pure bounty and by way merely of a present a sum of money, that will not have the character to cause the rule to come into operation. Similarly there may be various reasons why the testator should give property to a child. He may wish to free him from some embarrassment, or something of that kind. In cases of that sort upon the facts a gift may not be a portion at all, in which case, of course, the rule does not apply."

As appears from that passage, and also from Re Lacon (2) (particularly in the judgment of BOWEN, L.J., ([1891] 2 Ch. 497, 498)), the first matter which must be made out is that both the gift by will and the gift inter vivos made by the testator to his child are gifts in the nature of portions. Once that essential condition is established, a presumption arises that the testator intended the provision inter vivos to be on account of the provision by will, but the presumption may be rebutted if the circumstances in which the gift inter vivos was made are such as to show that the testator did not intend the provision inter vivos to be on account of the provision by will.

It was not disputed before me that the provision made for Ernest by the testator's will in the present case was in the nature of a portion. It was, however, contended on his behalf that, having regard to its character and the circumstances in which it was made, the testator's gift inter vivos of the farming stock to Ernest was not in the nature of a portion at all, and, alternatively, that, if this gift was in itself in the nature of a portion, its character and the circumstances in which it was made were sufficient to rebut the presumption. The question of portion or no portion being necessarily to a great extent a question of the testator's intention, it is hardly possible to distinguish circumstances relied on as tending to show that the gift inter vivos was not in the nature of a portion at all from circumstances relied on as tending to rebut the presumption on the footing that it was in itself in the nature of a portion, and I do not propose to do so.

First, as to the character of the gift of live and dead stock. I have no doubt that a gift by a farmer to his son of live and dead stock with which to set up in business as a farmer may be in the nature of a portion, and, in the absence of circumstances tending to show the contrary, would generally be regarded as such. In Taylor v. Taylor (3), SIR G. JESSEL, M.R., mentioned (L.R. 20 Eq. 158) the buying of the goodwill of a business for a son and giving him stock in trade as a typical instance of a portion. It was, however, contended that the difference in the character of the gift of live and dead stock from the provision made for Ernest in the present case was such as to rebut the presumption against double portions even if the circumstances were otherwise such as to raise it at all. Reference was made in this connection to Re Tussaud's Estate (4) and Re Jaques (5). The latter case is, no doubt, clear authority for the proposition stated in the headnote ([1903] 1 Ch. 267) "that the presumption against double portions will not prevail where the testamentary portion and subsequent advancement are not ejusdem generis," but the judgments of the Court of Appeal, as I understand them, further show that the proposition thus stated has no application where the "subsequent advancement," though not ejusdem generis with the testamentary provision, is one on which a money value was set at the time it was made. In the present case I think that, having regard to the fact that the testator's live and dead stock formed part of the assets which Ernest was to take in specie under the will in the event of his exercising the option under cl. 7, the gift inter vivos here was sufficiently ejusdem generis with the testamentary provision to prevent the exclusion or rebuttal of the presumption by reason of the difference in character between the two gifts. If I am wrong in that view, I think that in any case the difference in character is rendered immaterial by the circumstance that the live and dead stock was valued at the time of the gift inter vivos at £2,060 17s. 3d., and can, therefore, be regarded for the present purpose as a gift of so much money.

Next, it was said that, if the transaction of which the gift of the live and dead stock formed part were viewed as a whole, it would be found in truth to be no gift at all, but simply part of a transaction under which Ernest took over certain assets and assumed certain liabilities in the form of (i) the testator's share of the rent and other liabilities under the tenancy of the Laurels Farm, (ii) the rent payable and other liabilities incurred to the testator under the tenancy granted to Ernest of the Glebe Farm, and (iii) the overdraft of £151 17s. 3d. I cannot accept this argument. I think Ernest must be regarded as receiving a fair quid pro quo, in the form of the testator's share of the Laurels tenancy and the tenancy of the Glebe Farm granted to him by the testator, for the liabilities in respect of rent and so forth which he undertook, and this is certainly the effect of Mr. Black's evidence. That leaves the whole of the £2,060 worth of live and dead stock as pure gift, subject only to the question of the overdraft with which I will deal in a moment. It would, to my mind, be very strange if, in a case where a father gave his son valuable live and dead stock, granting him at the same time a tenancy at a fair rent of a farm on which to set up in business as a farmer, the son's liability for the rent would prevent the gift of the stock from being a gift, and, prima facie, a gift by way of portion.

Further, I do not think the fact that a gift has an element of liability attached to it in itself prevents the gift from being a portion. It is rather "a matter to be taken into consideration in considering what the value of the gift was": see per NORTH, J., in Re Vickers (6) (37 Ch.D. 535), a passage in his judgment which was not, I think, included in the disapproval expressed by the Court of Appeal in Re Jaques (5).

Finally, it was urged that the testator's sole object here was not to benefit Ernest, but simply to placate the war agricultural committee. The testator did not want to make the farms over to Ernest or anyone else, but, on the contrary, was extremely reluctant to do so. He was forced to resign their management to somebody on pain of eviction, and entered into this transaction with Ernest merely to extricate himself from the difficulty in which he was placed and procure the withdrawal of the notices. Therefore, it is contended, the case is not one of portion at all, any more than a payment to meet a son's pressing debts is a portion (as to which see Re Scott (7)). I think this argument is a non sequitur. I am quite prepared to accept the assumption that, but for the intervention of the committee, the testator would have retained the farms with the live and dead stock on them until he died, and that he only got rid of the farms and the stock under, in effect, the compulsion of the notices and the committee's insistence on them. But why did he select Ernest as the recipient? Ernest was under no pressing financial difficulties for extraordinary assistance such as would not on the authorities be regarded as in the nature of a portion, but Ernest was the testator's farmer son for whom the testator had made provision to the extent of two-thirds of his residuary estate with the option of taking the residue in specie, subject to a charge for Robert's one-third share to be quantified by means of a valuation of the whole if he desired to carry on the testator's farm as (it is reasonable to suppose) the testator contemplated Ernest would in all probability wish to do. This is, I think, quite plainly the reason why Ernest was selected to take over the farms and receive the live and dead stock. Viewed in this light, I think the circumstances tend to reinforce rather than rebut the presumption. The testator being compelled to go out of farming and make provision for the future management of the farms to the satisfaction of the committee, did so by, as it were, anticipating his demise, and putting Ernest in immediate beneficial possession of part of what he would in due course have taken under the testator's will. The attitude of the committee, so far as I can see, afforded no ground at all for increasing Ernest's provision at the expense of Robert, though it, no doubt, did afford good ground for putting Ernest into immediate possession of this part of the testamentary portion designed for him. For these reasons I am of opinion that this is a case to which the rule against double portions applies with respect to the gift to Ernest of the live and dead stock.

It remains to consider the question of the overdraft. A claim originally made that the credit balance in the bank account at the date of its transfer to Ernest should be treated as a gift additional to the live and dead stock for the purposes of the rule was rightly abandoned, on the ground that the balance was made up of farming receipts subsequent to the gift of the live and dead stock, or in other words simply represented the fruits of the gift. The overdraft of £151 17s. 3d. which existed at the date of the gift was discharged from the same source, and the value of the gift to Ernest was, therefore, pro tanto diminished. The precise arrangement (if any) come to about the overdraft at the time of the gift is not clear from the evidence, but there is no doubt it was in fact discharged in this way. I am, therefore, I think, justified in holding (and counsel for Robert did not press the contrary view) that the overdraft should be treated as a liability subject to which Ernest took the gift of the live and dead stock and the tenancies of the farms. In the result, therefore, I hold that the sum of £2,060 17s. 3d. (being the value of the live and dead stock at the date of the gift) less £151 17s. 3d. (being the amount of the overdraft at the same date) should be brought into account by Ernest in the ascertainment of the shares of the two sons in the testator's residuary estate. The costs of all parties as between solicitor and client will be borne by the testator's estate in due course of administration.

Declaration accordingly.

A Solicitors: Torr & Co., agents for Barnes & Lanham, Brackley (for the trustees); Preston, Lane-Claypon & O'Kelly, agents for Walter R. J. Law, Buckingham (for the first defendant); Preston, Lane-Claypon & O'Kelly, agents for Darby & Son, Oxford (for the second defendant).

[Reported by R. D. H. OSBORNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Affirmed. C.A. [1949] 1 All E.R. 344.

BERNBAUM v. BERNBAUM.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Barnard, J.), July 26, November 15, 1948.]

C Divorce—Practice—Order of registrar under Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17—Appeal to judge in chambers—R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 22A (1) (a), (2)—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 523), rr. 59, 81, 82.

Where a husband and a wife are parties to a matrimonial suit, an appeal from an order of a registrar on an application under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, lies to a judge in chambers under the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 59, notwithstanding the fact that, by r. 82 of those rules, the master has the jurisdiction and powers of a judge under s. 17 of the Act of 1882.

[AS TO APPEAL FROM REGISTRAR, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 777, para. 1231, and 1948 Supplement.

E FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES RULES, 1947, see RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 4th Edn., Special Supplement.]

Case referred to :

(1) Peduzzi v. Peduzzi (unreported).

SUMMONS, adjourned into open court, appealing from an order of the registrar under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17.

F At the hearing of the summons, which was taken out by the wife (who had obtained a decree of judicial separation from the husband), the husband took the preliminary point that the appeal lay to a Divisional Court and the judge in chambers had no jurisdiction to hear it. BARNARD, J., held that the summons was governed by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 59, and the appeal lay to a judge in chambers.

G John Ritchie for the wife.
Seuffert for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

H Nov. 15. BARNARD, J., read the following judgment. This appeal raises a question of the practice applicable to appeals from orders made under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, in the Divorce Division. The wife is Rebecca Bernbaum, and she is appealing from an order of the registrar made on Apr. 20, 1948, under the aforementioned Act. She obtained a decree of judicial separation from her husband, Henry Bernbaum, on Oct. 14, 1947. Counsel on behalf of the husband contends that I have no jurisdiction to hear this appeal, and that the appeal lies to a Divisional Court.

The former practice is concisely set out in RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, 4th ed., p. 246 :

"To decide a dispute as to the ownership of property between a husband and wife who are parties to a matrimonial suit, a summons is taken out under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, before a judge of the Divorce Division, who, if necessary, will refer the matter to one of the registrars to inquire and report: the solicitor then fills up a form of application for an appointment before the registrar, who, after hearing the evidence tendered by the parties, draws his report. This is formally filed by the applicant and the original summons restored to the judge's list."

The practice, however, is now governed by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 82, which is:

"Without prejudice to the exercise of any jurisdiction and powers conferred on him by virtue of R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 12, a registrar may exercise all the jurisdiction and powers conferred upon a judge of the Supreme Court by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17."

This rule brought the divorce practice into line with the practice in the King's Bench Division and reproduces, so far as s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is concerned, R.S.C., Ord. 54, r. 12A, with the substitution of the word "registrar" for "master." Appeals from a master of the King's Bench Division are governed by R.S.C., Ord. 54, rr. 21 and 22A. For the purpose of this appeal, I need only refer to r. 22A (1) (a) and (2), which read as follows:

"(1) There shall be a right of appeal from any finding decision order or judgment arrived at made given directed or entered by any master of the King's Bench Division on the hearing or determination by him of (a) Any trial or reference of any action cause issue or matter (including trials directed under Ord. 14, r. 7) (but excluding any application under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882), or any assessment of damages and whether by consent or otherwise . . . (2) Such appeal shall be to a Divisional Court by notice of motion."

In THE ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1946-47, p. 1107, there is a footnote (headed "Appeal from Master") to r. 22A to this effect:

"From an order directing an issue under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, appeal lies to a judge in chambers, but where a master tries an issue an appeal from his judgment thereon lies to a Divisional Court."

There is no such equivalent rule in the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, but I am asked to apply that rule by virtue of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 81:

"Subject to the provisions of these rules and of any statute, the Rules of the Supreme Court shall, notwithstanding the provisions of Ord. 68 thereof, apply with the necessary modifications to the practice and procedure in any matrimonial cause or matter to which these rules relate."

I am also asked to interpret the same rule as meaning that such an appeal lies to a Divisional Court. It is to be noted that the Rules of the Supreme Court only apply in divorce subject to the Matrimonial Causes Rules. Counsel for the wife has referred me to the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 59. That rule deals with appeals from a registrar, and is as follows:

"A party may appeal from an order or decision of a registrar to a judge in chambers by summons to be issued . . ."

Counsel for the wife contended that that rule governs this appeal. It might be argued that the language of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 82, constitutes the registrar a judge for settling disputes under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882:

"... a registrar may exercise all the jurisdiction and powers conferred upon a judge ..."

I reject that point of view. The present order is headed: "Before Mr. Registrar Long," and the registrar, although armed with the jurisdiction and powers of a judge under this section, still remains a registrar, and, therefore, I think an appeal from him is governed by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, r. 59, and lies to a judge in chambers. Quite recently, on Oct. 25 and 26, 1948, in Peduzzi v. Peduzzi (1), an appeal from WALLINGTON, J., who had dismissed an appeal from the registrar's order under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, was heard by the Court of Appeal, and, although this point as to jurisdiction was never raised, neither WALLINGTON, J., nor the Court of Appeal seemed to doubt his jurisdiction to hear the appeal. I, therefore, decide that the summons taken out by the wife appealing from the order of Apr. 20, 1948, to a judge in chambers is in order, and that the judge in chambers has jurisdiction to hear the appeal.

Judgment for the wife on the preliminary issue. Costs to be dealt with on hearing of appeal.

Solicitors: J. C. Clifford Watts (for the wife); Ferris, Roberts, Thomas & Co. (for the husband).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

HASTINGS AND FOLKESTONE GLASSWORKS, LTD.

v. KALSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Asquith, L.JJ., and Harman, J.), November 12, 23, 1948.]

Company—Director—Vacation of office—Conviction of "indictable offence"—Offence triable summarily or on indictment—Summary conviction—Unauthorised dealing in gold—Breach of Defence Regulations.

A company's articles provided that a director "convicted of an indictable offence" should vacate his office. The defendant, a director of the company, pleaded Guilty before a court of summary jurisdiction to a charge of unauthorised dealing in gold, contrary to the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, reg. 4, and was convicted and fined. By reg. 9 (1) the offence was punishable under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 92 (1), which provides that a person contravening or failing to comply with any of the regulations shall "(a) on summary conviction, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months or to a fine not exceeding £100, or to both such imprisonment and such fine, or (b) on conviction on indictment, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years or to a fine not exceeding £500, or to both such imprisonment and such fine." The company claimed a declaration that the defendant was disqualified from acting as a director.

HELD: whether or not an offence was "indictable" within the meaning of the company's articles depended on the nature and quality of the offence when committed, irrespective of the procedural manner in which it might subsequently be dealt with, and, therefore, as the offence of which the defendant was convicted was one which could be dealt with on indictment, he was "convicted of an indictable offence" within the meaning of the articles, and the company was entitled to the declaration asked for.

Decision of OLIVER, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 711), reversed.

[FOR THE DEFENCE (GENERAL) REGULATIONS, 1939, reg. 92 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 40, p. 1454.]

APPEAL by the plaintiff company from a decision of OLIVER, J., dated Mar. 22, 1948, and reported ([1948] 1 All E.R. 711).

The company brought an action for a declaration that the defendant was disqualified from acting as a director of the company and that his employment as co-manager had determined on the ground that he had been "convicted of an indictable offence." The defendant had been convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction of an offence against the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, reg. 4, which was triable summarily or on indictment. The declaration was refused by OLIVER, J., but the appeal by the plaintiff company from his decision was now allowed by the Court of Appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and G. Pollock for the plaintiff company.
Thesiger, K.C., and A. M. S. Neave for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 23. The following judgments were read.

TUCKER, L.J.: On Oct. 15, 1947, the defendant was a director of the plaintiff company. Article 26 of the articles of association of the plaintiff company is as follows:

"The office of a director shall be vacated . . . (c) if he be convicted of an indictable offence not being an offence under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, or any statutory provision in lieu or modification thereof."

On Oct. 15, 1947, the defendant was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction at Bow Street of an offence against the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, reg. 4, viz., that he, between Jan. 1 and Apr. 30, 1947, being in the United Kingdom and being entitled to sell gold, to wit 150 sovereigns, did fail to offer that gold for sale to H.M. Treasury or to a person designated by H.M. Treasury. He pleaded Guilty and was fined £200 and ordered to pay £20 costs, and an order was made for the confiscation of 120 sovereigns which had been recovered. By the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939, reg. 9 (1), the provisions of Pt. V of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, are made applicable for the purpose of enforcement of the Defence (Finance) Regulations, 1939. By reg. 92 (1) in Pt. V of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, it is provided as follows:

"If any person contravenes or fails to comply with any of these regulations . . . he shall [save as otherwise expressly provided by or under that regulation] be guilty of an offence against that regulation; and, subject to any special provisions contained in these regulations, a person guilty of an offence against any of these regulations shall—(a) on summary conviction, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 3 months or to a fine not exceeding £100, or to both such imprisonment and such fine, or (b) on conviction on indictment, be liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years or to a fine not exceeding £500, or to both such imprisonment and such fine."

Consequent on the defendant's conviction the plaintiff company brought an action claiming a declaration that, by reason of the conviction, the defendant was disqualified from acting as a director of the plaintiff company and that his office was vacated and his employment as co-manager determined. If his office as director was vacated, it would follow from the terms of his contract with the company that his employment as co-manager would ipso facto determine. The learned trial judge dismissed the plaintiff company's action.

The short question in this appeal is, accordingly, whether the defendant was "convicted of an indictable offence." As to the nature of the offence with which he was charged there is no question, and as to the fact that he was convicted there is equally no question. It is submitted on behalf of the plaintiff company that the only remaining question is, therefore, whether the offence was "indictable." It is said that this means "capable of being dealt with on indictment," and that this was an offence which, when committed, was capable of being dealt with on indictment, notwithstanding that the prosecution, in fact, subsequently elected to deal with it, as they were entitled to do, as a summary offence. Counsel for the defendant, in an admirable argument, contended that the matter must be looked at as at the moment when the defendant pleaded guilty, and that at that moment, by the election of the prosecution, the offence had, in fact, become a summary one, notwithstanding that, when committed, it was indictable. Counsel for the defendant argued that "convicted of an indictable offence" means either convicted on indictment or convicted summarily of an indictable offence triable summarily, being one of the offences enumerated in sched. II to the Criminal Justice Act, 1925. He says that an offence is not indictable within the meaning of art. 26 of the company's articles unless the accused was at the commencement of the proceedings in peril of being committed for trial on indictment, or unless the case is one in which he can elect to go to trial and he has, in fact, so elected, from which moment it is deemed to be an indictable offence and is treated accordingly. This test is, in effect, procedural and dependent on the election of the prosecution, subject to the approval of the court, or, in certain cases, on the election of the accused. On the other hand, the test contended for by the plaintiff company depends on the nature and quality of the offence when committed, irrespective of the procedural manner in which it may subsequently be dealt with.

I have come to the conclusion that the contention of the plaintiff company is to be preferred to that of the defendant which was accepted by OLIVER, J. I think the reference in the article to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, tends to support this view. There are five instances in this Act of cases where offences created by the Act may be dealt with either summarily or on indictment. They are to be found in ss. 8 (4), 11, 15, 28 and 112. I think the object of referring to that Act was to free the director from liability to loss of office on conviction of any one of these offences, irrespective of whether he happened to have been convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction or on indictment, on the basis that the offences created by the Act were by their nature indictable, and, therefore, within the article unless expressly excluded. I realise, however, that on the defendant's interpretation summary convictions under these sections would be excluded in any event and that it is said that the reference to the Act was merely to exclude convictions on indictment for the same offences. It would have been easy to say "convicted on indictment" if that was what was really intended, and I think that for this reason counsel for the defendant was compelled to concede that summary convictions for indictable offences triable summarily under the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, would be covered by the words "convicted of an indictable offence." For these reasons, I would allow this appeal.

ASQUITH, L.J.: Counsel for the plaintiff company, in opening this appeal, stated that it involved a very short point: What is meant by an "indictable offence" in art. 26 of the company's articles? Strictly speaking, I think counsel for the defendant defined the issue with exact precision when he said "What is meant by 'convicted of an indictable offence' " since, theoretically, at least, the meaning of "indictable offence" might have been affected (as, indeed, according to his argument it was affected) by the antecedent words, "convicted of." It may, however, be convenient to inquire, first, what "indictable offence" means without any antecedent words which might have a qualifying effect, and, secondly, whether the antecedent words make any difference.

Criminal offences or offences against public law—for such alone are here in question—fall into three categories for the present purpose :—(i) offences in respect of which proceedings by indictment alone will lie ; (ii) offences in respect of which summary proceedings alone will lie ; (iii) offences which can be proceeded against in either way according to the circumstances of the case—that is, the decision of the court with the consent of the accused, the election of the accused himself, or the election of the prosecution. If categories (i) and (ii) alone existed, the case would present no difficulty. The difficulty only arises from the existence of category (iii) within which the present case falls. What offences fall within that third category ? Here a sub-classification is necessary. The category splits into three sub-categories. (A) In some cases a statute or regulation with statutory force provides (in effect) that an offence may be proceeded against either summarily or by indictment, at the election presumably of the prosecution. The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, s. 2 (3), and the Dentists' Acts, 1878-1923, afford examples of such offences. (B) The second sub-category consists of cases falling within the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 17, which provides that, where the offence is such that the offender is liable on summary conviction to be imprisoned for more than 3 months, he may, before the charge has been gone into, claim to be tried by a jury on indictment, and that in that event the court of summary jurisdiction shall deal with the case in all respects as if the accused were charged with an indictable offence, and that the offence "shall be deemed to be" an indictable offence. (C) The third sub-category consists of offences specified in sched. II to the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, and provided for by s. 24 thereof. These are offences which before that statute could be tried by indictment only. By s. 24 of that Act a person charged with such an offence may be dealt with summarily, provided (i) that the court thinks this "expedient," and (ii) that the person charged, after being informed of his right to be tried by a jury, on indictment, consents to be tried summarily. The side note of this section is "Summary trial of indictable offences," and there is more than one reference in its substantive provisions to "indictable offences which are triable summarily." Schedule II uses similar language. The offence in the present case does not fall within sub-category (C). It is not in sched. II to the Act of 1925. It was not, before the Act of 1925, triable on indictment only. Indeed, it only came into existence in 1939. Nor, again, does it fall within sub-category (B), for it is not an offence which carries with it liability on summary conviction to a term of imprisonment for a period exceeding 3 months. It falls, in fact, within sub-category (A).

If the words "convicted of" were absent from art. 26 of the company's articles of association, it would, in my view, be quite clear as a matter of plain grammar and English that the offence was an "indictable offence." An "indictable offence" without any qualifying context can mean nothing else but an offence in respect of which an indictment would lie, and the prosecution could clearly have had this particular offence tried by indictment, if it had chosen. It is none the less "indictable" because, if the prosecution chooses, it can proceed in respect of it summarily. Neither the accused nor the bench, in such a case, has any option or election. This rests solely with the prosecution. The substantial question is whether this position is affected by the antecedent words "convicted of." Do these words compel this court to place itself, when inquiring whether the offence is "indictable," not at the point in time when the offence is committed, and when, accordingly, indictment is a possible way of proceeding in respect of it, but at a point of time when the prosecution have elected to proceed summarily, securing a conviction by that procedure. If as to the material time the latter alternative is right, then clearly at that time the offence has ceased to be, and is not, indictable, whatever it may have been earlier.

In my view, the material time is the time when the offence was committed, and before the prosecution has elected to proceed summarily or secured a conviction on that basis. The framers of the article plainly meant this severe penalty to be reserved for offences of a certain degree of gravity. The measure of gravity is to be sought, in my opinion, in what can happen to persons guilty of that class of offence, not what does happen to the particular offender in the subsequent chapter of events as the result of the prosecution's choice to proceed in one way or another. The argument against this view could not have been more cogently presented than it was by counsel for the defendant, but it involved refinements which I cannot believe entered into the purview or intention of the draftsman of the article. Counsel was driven to say that "indictable offences" included, not only offences triable on indictment only, but also offences within sched. II and s. 24 of the Act of 1925 (viz., categories (A) and (C)). He felt forced to do this because those provisions speak of the "summary trial of indictable offences" and of "indictable offences which are triable" (or "which may be dealt with") "summarily," but once it is admitted that an offence triable summarily can be described as an "indictable offence" the logic of the defendant's case is undermined. It is simpler and more satisfactory to adhere to the plain grammatical meaning and to say that "convicted of an indictable offence" means convicted (by whatever tribunal) of an offence for which the offender could have been indicted. It would have been easy for the draftsman to have said "convicted on indictment" if that had been what he meant. He may have meant it, but he has not said so.

Some argument the other way has been founded on the exception in art. 26 of offences under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, but the exception cuts both ways, for some of those excepted offences are of the same order as that involved here, viz., offences which can at the sole option of the prosecution be proceeded against either summarily or by indictment (sub-category (A) above). An exception cannot be carved out of a class which does not prima facie include the thing excepted. You can say "all fruit except pears," but you cannot say "all apples except pears." Hence the class here involved ("indictable offences") includes offences such as the present, if sense is to be made of the exception. Whether on the view here propounded offences covered by s. 17 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (sub-category (B)) are "indictable offences" is a question which may present some difficulty if and when it arises. Fortunately, in the present case, we are spared this complication. I agree with my Lord that the appeal should be allowed.

HARMAN, J.: Notwithstanding the able argument of counsel for the defendant, I would allow this appeal. Articles in this form, though not favoured in the best models, have been a familiar feature for many years, and I cannot bring myself to think that disqualification can depend on whether the offence in question is to be found in the schedule to an Act of 1925 or on the method by which the authorities choose to bring it home to the offender. In my judgment, the argument of counsel for the defendant lays too much stress on the word "convicted." Of course, it is a condition precedent to disqualification that there should have been a conviction. Mere accusation may be wholly unjustified, but, once a conviction has been recorded, the test is the nature of the offence. Not every offence brings the sanction into effect. It must have been "indictable," and that in plain English means "for which an indictment lies." This offence satisfies that test, and the defendant's disqualification, in my judgment, follows.

Appeal allowed with costs. Declaration in the terms asked for.

Solicitors: Field, Roscoe & Co., agents for Herington, Willings & Penry-Davey, Hastings (for the plaintiff company); Blyth, Dutton & Co., agents for Menneer, Idle & Brackett, St. Leonards-on-Sea (for the defendant).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, Barrister-at-Law.]

LANGHAM v. CITY OF LONDON CORPORATION.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen, L.J.J., and Birkett, J.), November 4, 5, 18, 1948.]

Tithe—Extinguishment—Detriment to officer—Compensation—“Substantial detriment to livelihood”—Enquiry into total income of office holder—City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947 (c. xxxi), s. 16 (1).

The City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947, was passed to extinguish tithes and tithe rates in the City of London. By s. 16 (1) of the Act: “Every officer in office at the date of the passing of this Act who suffers substantial detriment to his livelihood by reason of the passing of this Act shall be entitled to compensation from the corporation for that detriment.”

The claimant, a solicitor, had held the position of clerk to the Commissioners of the Rector’s Stipend, St. Andrew’s, Holborn, since July 2, 1935. On Dec. 12, 1947, he submitted a claim for £225, being a sum equal to three years’ net profits in respect of the appointment, and he also claimed an annual payment during his lifetime of £33 15s. 0d. In January, 1948, the town clerk wrote to the claimant asking for “full details as to the extent of your livelihood.” This request was repeated in February, 1948, but the claimant refused to supply the details required and the corporation disallowed the claim on the ground that without information as to the claimant’s livelihood they were unable to form any judgment on the question of “substantial detriment.” The claimant appealed to the Mayor’s and City of London Court for a decision on certain preliminary points including the question whether “in making a claim on the corporation it was incumbent on the claimant to furnish any or what evidence of his financial circumstances other than the emoluments of the office lost.”

HELD: the statute was taking away something which the claimant formerly possessed and he was entitled to have the section strictly construed. If the loss was a substantial detriment to his livelihood in the natural and ordinary meaning of words, he was entitled to compensation whether he was otherwise rich or poor, and that question could be determined without requiring the claimant to produce evidence of means.

Per TUCKER, L.J.: The practice of submitting a preliminary question to the judge for his decision, framed somewhat in the manner of a consultative case for the opinion of the court, is not to be encouraged. A case should be tried out to the end and finally determined before it is brought to the Court of Appeal.

[AS TO TITHES IN LONDON, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 11, pp. 898, 899, para. 1609; AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF LOCAL, PERSONAL, AND PRIVATE STATUTES, see ibid., Vol. 31, pp. 544-547, paras. 723-729; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 42, pp. 740-744, Nos. 1640-1681.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Herron v. Rathmines & Rathgar Improvement Comrs., [1892] A.C. 498; 67 L.T. 658; 42 Digest 613, 134.
- (2) Bournemouth-Swanage Motor Road & Ferry Co. v. Harvey & Sons, (1928), 98 L.J.Ch. 118; 42 Digest 743, 1674.

APPEAL from a decision of His Honour Judge THOMAS, dated May 16, 1948, given at the Mayor’s and City of London Court.

The claimant claimed compensation for loss of salary as clerk to the Commissioners of the Rector’s Stipend, St. Andrew’s, Holborn, due to the passing of the City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947. His claim was disallowed on the ground that he had refused to supply to the corporation details of his total income to help them to determine whether he had suffered substantial detriment to his livelihood. On an appeal by him to the Mayor’s and City of London Court, His Honour Judge THOMAS found that the corporation were not justified in insisting on his giving details of his total income and from that judgment the corporation appealed. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal.

Fox-Andrews, K.C., and Heathcote-Williams for the corporation.

Capewell, K.C., L. A. Blundell and Plume for the claimant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 18. TUCKER, L.J.: I will ask BIRKETT, J., to read the first judgment in this case.

The following judgments were read.

BIRKETT, J.: This is an appeal from the judgment of His Honour Judge THOMAS given at the Mayor's and City of London Court on May 16, 1948. The appellants are the Corporation of London and the respondent is Arthur Cuthbert Langham. The claimant is a solicitor, and since July 2, 1935, he had held the position of clerk to the Commissioners of the Rector's Stipend, St. Andrew's, Holborn, at an annual salary of £75 a year. This appointment, though strictly determinable on reasonable notice, had come to be regarded in practice and in past experience as a permanent one, and, indeed, the claimant's father had held this appointment for 50 years. The City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947, was passed in July, 1947, and had for its purpose the extinguishing of tithes and tithe rates in the city of London. Section 16 (1) of the Act reads as follows:

"Every officer in office at the date of the passing of this Act who suffers substantial detriment to his livelihood by reason of the passing of this Act shall be entitled to compensation from the corporation for that detriment."

It was further provided, by s. 16 (5) that, if the corporation disallowed any claim, in whole or in part, the claimant could appeal to the Mayor's and City of London Court and that court had power to confirm, override or vary the decision of the corporation.

On Dec. 12, 1947, the claimant made his claim in writing claiming the payment of £225 as a capital sum which he had paid on being admitted to partnership in respect of this appointment, being, as he alleged, a sum equal to three years' net profits, that is three times £75. He also claimed an annual payment during his lifetime of £33 15s. 0d. In January, 1948, the town clerk wrote to the claimant asking for "full details as to the extent of your livelihood," and on Feb. 4 the claimant wrote declining to furnish such details. On Feb. 5 the town clerk wrote again to the claimant repeating his request, and he stated in the letter: "It must be clear to you that whilst a claimant with a total income of say £300 per annum suffers substantial detriment to his livelihood by the cesser of say £50 per annum, the claimant with a total income of say £3,000 per annum does not." The claimant having failed to comply with the demand in the letter from the town clerk, the corporation disallowed the claim, stating that without the information as to his livelihood they were unable to form any judgment on the question of substantial detriment. Accordingly, the matter went to the Mayor's and City of London Court, and it was agreed between the parties that certain preliminary points should first be tried, the second of those points being: "In making a claim on the corporation, was it incumbent on the claimant to furnish any and what evidence of his financial circumstances other than the emoluments of the office lost?" The learned judge found that the corporation were not justified in insisting on a claimant giving details of his total income, and from that judgment the corporation appeal to this court. Two passages in the judgment of the learned judge will be enough to show the grounds on which his judgment was based. He said:

"In my view, really the only question I have to decide on this part of the application is whether 'substantial' here means such a detriment as will take from a man a large portion of his livelihood or whether it means that it will take something from him which is more than a trifling trivial matter which ought not to be considered . . . That being so, it does not seem to me possible that where a man shows or puts forward a claim, which for this purpose one must consider is more or less justified, of £2,500 or £86 per year, it can be necessary for the person who is considering whether there is a substantial detriment to his livelihood to know what the total income is."

In this court it was submitted on behalf of the corporation that it was impossible to decide whether there had been a substantial detriment to the livelihood of the claimant without knowing what that livelihood in fact was, and the demand for a financial return of income was, therefore, justified. For the claimant it was submitted that the learned judge was right in his conclusion, that the statute did not require the claimant to supply the details of his means of living, and that the question raised by the statute could be decided on the statement of facts supplied by him, which showed the actual loss sustained. This appeal was not concerned with any questions of amount but was confined solely to the proper answer to the agreed question.

When considering the wording of s. 16 (1), it is to be remembered that this is a private Act of Parliament which has the effect of depriving certain persons of income formerly enjoyed by them, and the rule of construction to be applied must be that where doubt arises the words must be construed most strongly against him who uses them. "The benefit of the doubt is to be given to those who might be prejudiced by the exercise of the powers which the enactment grants and against those who claim to exercise them": see MAXWELL on the INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES, 9th ed., p. 306, and LORD MACNAGHTEN in Herron v. Rathmines Improvement Commissioners (1). To deprive the claimant by a private Act of Parliament of the right to do what he was doing for reward at the passing of the Act requires clear and unequivocal words in the private Act: see Bournemouth-Swanage Motor Road and Ferry Company v. Harvey & Sons (2). Applying these rules of construction to the section, it is scarcely to be supposed that any compensation to be paid was to be dependent on the amount of income owned or enjoyed by the claimant. If so, it would be introducing a means test of a most unusual kind. The question then would not be the question in the section, namely: "Is this a substantial detriment to his livelihood?" but, "Is this a substantial detriment to his livelihood, having regard to his financial position?" If that had been intended, the statute could easily have said so, but I do not think that such a construction is warranted by the provisions of this private Act. The question for the corporation is whether the loss suffered by the claimant, in ordinary language, is a thing of substance as distinct from a loss that is trivial and not worth consideration. If that be the right construction, the question can well be determined without knowing the total means of the claimant. I do not think that the compensation to be paid should depend on whether a claimant is rich or poor. These are comparative terms, and it might be necessary to go into all the details of a claimant's private life, if poverty or riches were elements in the assessment. The statute is taking away something a man formerly possessed, and he is entitled to have the section strictly construed. If the loss is a substantial detriment to his livelihood in the natural and ordinary meaning of words, he is entitled to compensation whether he be otherwise rich or poor, and that question can be determined without requiring the claimant to produce evidence of means. I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was correct in his finding and that this appeal should be dismissed.

TUCKER, L.J.: I agree with the judgment which has been delivered by BIRKETT, J., and I do not wish to add anything with regard to the construction of s. 16 of the City of London (Tithes) Act, 1947. I do, however, desire to make some observations on the manner in which this matter has been brought before us.

A A number of similar cases were pending before the Mayor's and City of London Court and it was thought convenient to deal with this as a test case by submitting a preliminary question to the judge for his decision framed somewhat in the manner of a consultative case for the opinion of the court. There were no pleadings, there was no agreed statement of facts in writing, and the question submitted was not very aptly framed. The learned judge seems with the tacit consent of the parties to have amended the question so as to confine it to the point really at issue, namely, the question whether or not the claimant was bound to furnish evidence of his total income to enable the corporation to decide whether there had been a substantial detriment to it or to his livelihood. In substance, what the learned judge was really asked to decide was whether the corporation were justified in dismissing Mr. Langham's claim in limine by reason of his refusal to disclose full details of his financial position. To avoid involving the parties in further expense I am content to deal with this appeal on the basis that the question submitted for decision as a preliminary issue was intended to be and was in fact dealt with as if it had been framed as indicated above. These attempts at short cuts seldom achieve their purpose and I am by no means certain that even now other points of difference may not arise. If this should unhappily occur I hope that some case will be tried out to the end and finally determined before it is brought again to this court.

D COHEN, L.J. : I have had the opportunity of reading the two judgments which have been delivered, and I do not desire to add any reasons of my own in concurring in the view that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : The Comptroller and City Solicitor (for the corporation) ; Sharpe, Prichard & Co. (for the claimant).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

E E. H. LEWIS & SON, LTD. v. MORELLI AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Asquith, L.J.J., and Harman, J.), November 9, 10, 11, 23, 1948.]

Appeal—Court of Appeal—Fresh evidence—Evidence obtainable at time of trial—Application of Rent Acts not disputed at trial—Admission of evidence in Court of Appeal to prove rateable value—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4.

F Landlord and Tenant—Landlord's title questioned by tenant—Estoppel.

The plaintiffs brought an action against two defendants to recover possession of certain premises. The second defendant pleaded inter alia that the premises were subject to the Rent Acts and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to possession. At the hearing, the suggestion that the Rent Acts were not applicable to the premises was disclaimed by the plaintiffs. G On appeal, the plaintiffs asked the court to admit evidence to show the rateable value of the premises, as shown in the rate book for the district in question, in order to prove that the premises did not come within the provisions of the Acts, it being contended that there were special circumstances within R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, to warrant the admission of this evidence in that it consisted of an extract from a public document and was, therefore, H conclusive and unassailable.

HELD : even assuming that the evidence, if admitted, would be conclusive in favour of the plaintiffs, it was evidence which could easily have been obtained at the time of the trial, and for that reason and in view of the disclaimer by the plaintiffs it should not be admitted.

Dictum of LORD CHELMSFORD in Shedden v. Patrick & A.-G. (1869) (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 545 ; 22 L.T. 634), quoted by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Nash v. Rochford Rural Council ([1917] 1 K.B. 393 ; 116 L.T. 132), applied.

Observations on the doctrine that a tenant may not question his landlord's title.

Cases referred to :

- (1) Shedden v. Patrick & A.-G., (1869), L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 470; 22 L.T. 631, H.L.; 22 Digest 476, 5022.
- (2) Nash v. Rochford Rural Council, [1917] 1 K.B. 384; 81 J.P. 57; 86 L.J.K.B. 370; 116 L.T. 129; 22 Digest 477, 5027.
- (3) Sanders v. Sanders, (1881), 19 Ch.D. 373; 51 L.J.Ch. 276; 45 L.T. 637; 32 Digest 458, 1250.
- (4) Morton v. Woods, (1869), L.R. 4 Q.B. 293; 9 B. & S. 632; 38 L.J.Q.B. 81; 21 Digest 250, 752.
- (5) Jolly v. Arbuthnot, (1859), 4 De G. & J. 224; 28 L.J.Ch. 547; 33 L.T.O.S. 263; 23 J.P. 677; 21 Digest 250, 751.

APPLICATION to admit fresh evidence.

The plaintiffs brought an action to recover possession of premises situated at No. 39, Floral Street, Covent Garden. The issues as between the plaintiffs and the second defendant were (a) whether the second defendant had acquired a tenancy of the premises from the plaintiffs, after a previous tenancy to the first defendant, one Morelli, had been determined, and (b) whether the tenancy had been duly determined. The second defendant pleaded inter alia that she had occupied the premises as a dwelling-house at which she had carried on and still carried on the business of a cafe proprietor and that the provisions of the Rent Acts applied to the premises and, accordingly, the plaintiffs were not entitled to possession. At the trial counsel for the plaintiff, in dealing with this point said: "I think all I can say is this. If this lady has an oral weekly tenancy, I do not think I shall contend that she is not entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts, subject, of course, to her proving she is using the premises for residential purposes." The case was, therefore, dealt with on the basis that the Rent Acts applied. On appeal, the plaintiffs wished to call evidence to show that the rateable value of the premises, as shown in the rate book, was such as to take them out of the provisions of the Acts. The Court of Appeal refused to admit this evidence.

Fox-Andrews, K.C., and Rees-Davies for the plaintiffs.

Barry, K.C., and Jukes for the defendant.

TUCKER, L.J.: In this case counsel for the plaintiffs asks us to admit some fresh evidence which was not adduced in the court below. He applies under the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4, the relevant words of which are :

"Upon appeals from a judgment after trial or hearing of any cause or matter upon the merits, . . . further evidence (save as to matters subsequent as aforesaid) shall be admitted on special grounds only, and not without special leave of the court."

The evidence which he asks us to admit is evidence to show the rateable value of certain premises as shown in the rate book for the district in question.

The plaintiffs brought an action against two defendants, the second of whom is the only respondent in the present appeal, to recover possession of certain premises situated at No. 39, Floral Street, Covent Garden. The issues as between the plaintiffs and the second defendant were, first, whether or not the second defendant had at any time acquired a tenancy of the premises from the plaintiffs; secondly, whether or not that tenancy had been duly determined; and, thirdly, the second defendant raised the following defence: "At all material times the second defendant has occupied and still occupies the said premises as a dwelling-house at which she has carried on and still carries on the business of a cafe proprietor and will object that the provisions of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920-1939, apply to the said premises, and that, accordingly, the plaintiffs, by reason of the provisions of the said Acts, are not entitled in any event to possession thereof." The plaintiffs in due course delivered a reply. It is clear, therefore, that one of the issues which might arise was whether or not the premises were within the Rent Restrictions Acts.

A Section 7 (1) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1938, provides :

"If any question arises in any proceedings whether the principal Acts apply to a dwelling-house, it shall be deemed to be a dwelling-house to which those Acts apply unless the contrary is shown."

B This question, therefore, having been raised on the pleadings, the court was bound to proceed to deem the house to be within the Acts unless the contrary was shown. So far from the contrary being shown, counsel for the plaintiffs said to the learned judge : "I think all I can say is this. If this lady has an oral weekly tenancy, I do not think I shall contend that she is not entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts, subject, of course, to her proving she is using the premises for residential purposes." From then onwards, no question was C ever raised suggesting that the Rent Acts were not applicable to the premises, and the case was dealt with on that basis down to judgment. It is now sought to adduce evidence which, it is said, if accepted, will conclusively show that the whole basis of the judgment in the court below was wrong. It is argued that this court, in its desire to arrive at the truth and to save further litigation, should allow this evidence to be admitted. That is an attractive argument D from many points of view, but, none the less, I have come to the conclusion that the evidence should not be admitted.

To do so, in my view, would be contrary to the practice of this court, and to the principles which guide the court in dealing with applications under Ord. 58, r. 4. It would result in allowing the plaintiffs to take a new point E which was not only not taken, but was expressly disclaimed, in the court below, and to seek to establish that new point by adducing evidence which clearly was available and could have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence before the trial in the court below. Where a point concerning the Rent Acts arises, the question of the rateable value of the premises obviously must be a material matter for the legal advisers of any party to consider. It appears that no steps whatever were taken to procure this evidence which F could have been obtained with the greatest ease.

I do not think it is necessary to refer to the authorities which have been brought to our notice once again in any great detail. It is not disputed that the general principle laid down originally in Shedden v. Patrick (1), and quoted by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Nash v. Rochford Rural Council (2), is applicable. SCRUTTON, L.J., said, quoting LORD CHELMSFORD ([1917] 1 K.B. 393) :

G " 'It is an invariable rule in all the courts, and one founded upon the clearest principles of reason and justice, that if evidence which either was in the possession of parties at the time of a trial, or by proper diligence might have been obtained, is either not produced, or has not been procured, and the case is decided adversely to the side to which the evidence was available, H no opportunity for producing that evidence ought to be given by the granting a new trial.' "

That principle also applies to the admission of further evidence in this court. Counsel for the plaintiffs argues, however, that there are special circumstances in the present case within the meaning of Ord. 58, r. 4, in that the very nature of the evidence is such that, if admitted, it cannot be controverted as it comes from a public document and would be decisive of the case. He says that, as shown in the authorities, the court is normally dealing with oral evidence which is or may be highly controversial and where the court is dealing with documentary evidence it is also generally of a controversial character or, at any rate, not conclusive and unassailable as is this extract from a public document. I do not think that this case can be distinguished on those grounds.

For the purposes of my judgment, I am prepared to assume that the evidence, if admitted, would be conclusive in favour of counsel for the plaintiffs, but, none the less, it is evidence which could have been obtained with the greatest possible ease. True that it is evidence dealing with the status of premises, but it is evidence of a fact which it was necessary to prove to show the status of the premises. In view of the admission made in the court below, and in view of the fact that this evidence could have been obtained by ordinary elementary precautions and care, I think that, if we were to admit it, we should be creating a dangerous precedent and be acting far beyond what has been laid down in the authorities. In my view, therefore, this evidence should not be admitted.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. To grant this application would, it is true, not entail all the abuses and risks which are envisaged by SIR GEORGE JESSEL in Sanders v. Sanders (3). For instance, it would not invite the concoction of evidence or the commission of perjury. It might even conceivably have the result of avoiding circuitry, but with reasonable diligence the facts sought to have been proved could easily have been proved below. Any departure from the rule so strongly laid down in Shedden v. Patrick (1), and so emphatically re-affirmed in Nash v. Rochford Rural Council (2), is, to my mind, opening the door to manifest dangers and inconveniences, and we would not be justified, even on the facts of this case, in making such an encroachment.

HARMAN, J.: To my mind this may be a sacrifice on the altar of principle, but I am not prepared to dissent from what has fallen from my Lords' lips.

Admission of additional evidence refused.

The appeal was then argued.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 23. HARMAN, J., delivering the judgment of the court, examined the evidence and said that the second defendant had failed to prove that the relationship of landlord and tenant ever came into being between her and the plaintiffs. The second defendant never having been a tenant but only an agent for the first defendant, Morelli, she had no rights when he ceased to have any, namely, at Lady Day, 1947. That made it unnecessary to consider the question of estoppel, but, as it had been elaborately argued, he would add one or two observations on it. His LORDSHIP continued: The doctrine that a tenant may not question his landlord's title is familiar law. This is sometimes said to rest on estoppel, and, when a lease is under seal, no doubt this is so. The doctrine, however, has been extended by analogy to written, and even to oral, tenancies. It has been well described as arising by intendment of law from the relationship of landlord and tenant: see KELLY, C.B., in Morton v. Woods (4) (L.R. 4 Q.B. 304), citing LORD CHELMSFORD in Jolly v. Arbuthnot (5). We do not think it operates by estoppel strictly so called in cases where there is no writing. The belief of the tenant in his landlord's ability to grant the term is not essential. He may know or have notice of a defect in his landlord's title and yet be precluded, once he has entered and paid rent, from denying it: see Morton v. Woods (4). Thus, an essential feature of an ordinary estoppel in pais, namely, reliance on the truth of the representation made, may be lacking. It is, therefore, a special doctrine developed by analogy from leases by specialty and peculiar to the relationship of landlord and tenant. That the doctrine exists we feel no doubt, and, if it does, so does its converse, namely, that, a landlord having by his offer of a tenancy induced a tenant to enter into (or remain in) occupation and to pay rent, cannot deny the validity of the tenancy by alleging his own want of title to create it. So, here, if we had found that a tenancy was intended to be created in the second defendant in 1940 we should have held that the plaintiffs were precluded from bringing forward their obligations to the first defendant, Morelli, or the term vested by them in him as an excuse to avoid the new obligations which they would thus have incurred to the respondent. Morelli, of course, could not be affected and might re-enter by title paramount, but, as between themselves and their tenant, we should have held the plaintiffs irrevocably bound. When, in 1947, their reversion fell in this would serve by analogy to feed the quasi-estoppel. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for possession.

Appeal allowed with costs here and below.

Solicitors : Burton, Yeates & Hart (for the plaintiffs); Cochrane & Crippwell (for the defendants).

[Reported by C. ST.J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Reversed. H.L. sub nom. ZIVNOSTENSKA BANKA NATIONAL CORPN. v. FRANKMAN. [1949] 2 All E.R. 671.

FRANKMAN v. ANGLO-PRAGUE CREDIT BANK.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Goddard, C.J., Asquith and Singleton, L.JJ.), November 2, 3, 4, 1948.]

Conflict of Laws—Contract—Legality—Customer's debentures deposited by foreign bank at London branch—Condition that deposits be governed by laws of place where kept—Czech laws forbidding re-delivery of debentures—Validity of demand in London.

The plaintiff, as personal representative of Mrs. F., claimed the return of three debentures of £100 each in a Czechoslovak company from the London branch of the defendant bank whose head-office was in Prague. The debentures were bought in 1930 by one W. who was a Czechoslovak national residing in that country. In 1935 W. died and Mrs. F., his sister, succeeded to his estate. In 1938 Mrs. F. was notified by the defendant bank that the bonds were deposited in London and would be kept there at her risk unless she otherwise ordered. At the same time Mrs. F. received from the defendant bank conditions of business which contained a clause that securities deposited with correspondents abroad would be subject to the laws of the country where they were deposited. In 1945 Mrs. F. died in England. The defendant bank refused to return the securities to the plaintiff because, according to the laws of Czechoslovakia, the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia was necessary and this had been refused.

HELD : as the debentures were to be held in London and the contract provided that obligations to be performed in England should be treated as governed by English municipal law, the Czech domestic legislation, such as the exchange or currency regulations, did not govern their deposit, and the plaintiff, who was at all material times in England, could validly assert his right to re-delivery by a demand addressed to the defendant's London branch where the bonds were, instead of resorting to the circuitry of addressing such a demand to the Prague Head Office where they were not.

Decision of CASSELS, J. ([1948] 1 All E.R. 337; [1948] 1 K.B. 730), reversed.

[AS TO ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACTS ILLEGAL BY THE LEX LOCI SOLUTIONIS, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 6, p. 272, para. 327; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 11, pp. 402, 403, Nos. 729-738.]

Case referred to :

Kahler v. Midland Bank, Ltd., [1948] 1 All E.R. 811.

APPEAL from a decision of CASSELS, J., dated Feb. 2, 1948, in an action by the plaintiff, as administrator of his mother, Mrs. Frankman, to recover from the defendants, the Anglo-Prague Credit Bank, three debentures of £100 each in Skoda Works, a Czechoslovakian company, which had been deposited by the bank at its London office. CASSELS, J., held that, as Czechoslovak law prohibited the surrender of the bonds in London without the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia, which had been refused, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the bonds. This decision was now reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Laski, K.C., and R. J. S. Thompson for the plaintiff.

Sir Valentine Holmes, K.C., and J. P. Ashworth for the defendants.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is an appeal against a judgment of CASSELS, J., in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendants, Anglo-Prague Credit Bank, whose head office is in Prague and who have a London office, three debentures of £100 each in Skoda Works, which is a Czechoslovak company. The bonds in question were part of an issue made in sterling in London. The plaintiff's case is that he is the owner of those bonds as the administrator of his mother, who, in her turn, was the administratrix of the original subscriber for the bonds.

Questions relating to foreign law have been raised and it is represented as a case of very great importance to the defendants who, no doubt, are anxious that in anything they do they should not expose their head office in Prague and the employees of that office to any sanctions which the totalitarian government now in power in Czechoslovakia might see fit to impose on them if they do anything contrary to law. It is not at all surprising, therefore, that they say in the circumstances that have happened that they will only hand over these bonds to the plaintiff, whose title they do not deny, if the English courts order them to do it. CASSELS, J., held that the Czechoslovak law prohibited the handing over of these bonds in London without the consent of the National Bank of Czechoslovakia, and that, as the National Bank of Czechoslovakia refused to give consent, the plaintiff could not get them from the bank in London. For reasons which I shall endeavour to express when I have dealt with the facts, with all respect to the learned judge who gave a long and reasoned judgment in this case, I cannot take the same view.

The story starts in 1930, at which time a Doctor Richard Weiner, a Czechoslovak national living at that time near Prague, who was the brother of a Mrs. Frankman, ordered the bank to buy these three debentures for him in London. The bank carried out that transaction for him in London and on Oct. 14, 1930, they wrote to him saying: "We beg to inform you that in accordance with your instruction of Oct. 8 we have bought for your account the undermentioned securities, for which we have debited you, according to statement. We are crediting you with the securities on your securities account. At the same time we take note of your authorisation to deal with the securities enumerated below as we choose, and to deposit the same as we think best, even abroad. We do not mention about the name of our foreign correspondent with whom the securities acquired and mentioned below are deposited, following your declaration, according to which you exempted us from our obligation to do so." Apparently, Dr. Weiner did not want to have anything in writing showing where these bonds were deposited. At the same time, we know that the transaction was carried out by the bank in accordance with the banking conditions which they imposed on all their customers. If anybody had seen those conditions and this document, there would not have been much doubt in his mind that the bank had bought these bonds in London (which was the only place at which at that time they could be bought, because it was a new London issue) and that they were holding them in London, as, in fact, they were. The document which I have just read, in setting out in the account at the bottom the amount in which Dr. Weiner was debited for this purpose, shows that the securities would be bought on the London Stock Exchange.

Dr. Weiner died in 1935 and his sister, Mrs. Frankman, succeeded to his estate. She was thereupon possessed, not only of those three £100 debentures, but also of a further £400 of debentures which either she or Dr. Weiner had bought. In 1935, therefore, she was the owner of £700 debentures. At that time she had an ordinary current account at the head office of this bank in Prague. On Mar. 22, 1938, the head office at Prague wrote to her: "We write to inform you that, by order of our Trautenau branch, we credit you with £700 6 per cent. Skoda Works debentures." They enclosed the coupons and set out the numbers. They first set out the three £100 bonds, numbered 261,991; 261,992 and 261,993, which had been bought for Dr. Weiner, and then they set out the other four debentures and another bond, the number of which they give, and they say: "On your deposit account with us—held in London as above. We enclose in addition to our business conditions, a declaration concerning the deposit of the securities abroad and specimen signature forms, which please return to us duly completed." That is signed by the Anglo-Prague Credit Bank, at Prague. They sent her some specimen signature forms, which she did not fill in. On Apr. 27, 1938, they wrote to her: "As you have not returned to us the declaration form sent to you on the 22nd of last month relating to the place of custody of your £700 6 per cent. Skoda Works debentures, we have to inform you that the above-mentioned securities are deposited with our branch in London. Requesting you to take notice of this fact."

The Conditions of Business which they had sent to Mrs. Frankman in March, contain this clause:

"Condition 11. As regards such stocks and securities as were purchased at a stock exchange other than that of Prague or were received by any bank other than a Prague bank, we shall not have the same sent to us unless the customer has ordered the transmission thereof at his own expense and risk, but will leave the same, at the risk and expense of the customer, deposited with our correspondent, where they shall be subject to the laws of the respective country [the country where they are deposited]. This also applies in the case of our having credited the principal with such securities on a securities deposit account. In the event of our entrusting any securities to or leaving them in the custody of any third party—provided, of course, that we are otherwise authorised so to do—we shall only be responsible for our diligence in selecting the depositary, naturally subject to the provisions of the law of Oct. 10, 1924."

I do not think that that last sentence has any bearing on this case. Condition 50, on which considerable reliance is placed by the bank, is in these terms:

"The place of performance and payment in respect of all obligations resulting from the business connection with us shall be considered to be the place of that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transaction with the customer, except in so far, however, as any special stipulation has been made in this connection."

In 1942, Mrs. Frankman closed her account with the bank, but, meanwhile, about the end of 1938 she had come to London and lived here until she died in 1945. She was not, for the purpose of the Trading with the Enemy Act, an enemy, and once or twice she received dividends on these shares, which were credited to her account in Prague before she closed her account there. On July 6, 1940, she wrote a letter to the British and Allied Investments Corporation, Ltd., who were working in conjunction with the Custodian of Enemy Property with regard to these three debentures, identifying herself as the owner of the debentures. There the matter remained until she died in August, 1945. After she died, her son, the plaintiff, took out letters of administration. They were granted to him and he thereby became her personal representative. He appears to have been her sole next of kin, and, therefore, the title in these three debentures had passed to him.

On Sept. 11, 1946, his solicitors in Manchester wrote to the Custodian of Enemy Property, who answered saying that the position appeared to be "that the deceased was not of enemy status within the meaning of the Act, neither is the administrator of her estate, who is stated to be the sole beneficiary. The Custodian is not, therefore, concerned with the estate and can have no objection to the sale of the first mortgage debentures in the Skoda Works, Ltd. belonging thereto, as far as the trading with the enemy legislation is concerned." On Sept. 21, 1946, the solicitors wrote to the London branch of the bank, where these debentures were, saying: "Referring to our interview with you some days ago, we have now received a letter from the Custodian of Enemy Property stating that as the deceased was not of enemy status within the meaning of the Act, the Custodian is not concerned with the estate, and, therefore, can have no objection to the sale of the first mortgage debentures in the Skoda Works, Ltd., belonging to her. May we now enquire whether this document is in the possession of your bank and if so whether you are prepared to forward it on to us on behalf of your client on sending you the necessary authority."

The position with regard to the bank at that time, so far as this court was concerned, was this. The Treasury had granted a licence to the bank to continue its banking business in England. It had, of course, been shut off from all connection with its head office in Prague during the war and in September, 1946, there certainly had been, and there has not even yet, so far as I know, been, any conclusion of the war with those parts, although Czechoslovakia is now no longer an occupied country. According, however, to the evidence which was given by the defendants, the London branch did not link up again with its head office and have communications with them until Dec. 31, 1946, or January, 1947. The bank, however, did not hand over the bonds at that time and further requests were made which did not bring any satisfaction, and the matter then passed into the hands of the bank's solicitors. On Nov. 26 they wrote this letter to the plaintiff's solicitors: "Your letter of Nov. 18, addressed to our clients has been handed to us. Although we have not seen the earlier correspondence we understand that you act for the executors of Mrs. Paula Frankman and are claiming, on her behalf the delivery of certain bonds of the Skoda Works. Entirely without prejudice to any attitude which our clients might have to take up if legal proceedings were commenced, we should like to give you the following information: (1) We gather from our clients that they are satisfied that Mrs. Paula Frankman was the person entitled to the bonds so that, if proper evidence of the grant of probate can be furnished, this would seem to dispose of the question of the title of the executors to receive the bonds. (2) The next stumbling block is the interest of the Custodian of Enemy Property. Our clients inform us that their discussions with the Trading with the Enemy Department have advanced to a stage at which it seems practically certain that the Custodian will release the bonds with a view to enabling them to be handed over to the rightful owners. (3) We are informed, however, that under the laws of Czechoslovakia which govern the deposit of these bonds, the consent of the Czech National Bank is required before they can be handed out. This consent is not forthcoming. This, as far as we can see, is the only remaining stumbling block. Our clients, having no beneficial interest in the bonds, are obviously even less anxious to embark upon legal proceedings than yours, and we are looking into this question of the consent of the National Bank in order to find out whether there is any way of disposing of it. If nothing comes of this it may be that you will feel bound to advise your clients to test the question in the English courts, but for the moment we would suggest that you might defer legal action until we have had a chance of finding out more about the situation. Perhaps you would let us hear from you on the matter." The defendants asked the National Bank of Czechoslovakia to give their consent to the handing over of these debentures, that bank refused its consent, and thereupon this writ was issued.

- A A great deal of time was taken up in the course of the case with the evidence of a Czech lawyer with regard to the Czech law regulating all matters of foreign exchange and so forth. I do not think that it is necessary to go through that evidence in detail, for a reason which will appear in a moment. Suffice it to say that the laws in force in Czechoslovakia at all materials times made it illegal in Czechoslovakia for a Czech subject, a resident, to transfer any property to a
- B non-resident or, as it was called in the language that was used in the court below, "an exchange foreigner." For the purposes of this case, the people who are to be regarded as being "exchange foreigners" may be summarised as people resident outside Czechoslovakia, and "exchange citizens" as people who were resident in Czechoslovakia. Transactions between "exchange citizens" and "exchange foreigners" were prohibited without the consent of the
- C National Bank. So far as that part of the case was concerned, the Czech lawyer who was called agreed that for the purpose of Czech law the English branch of this bank was regarded as an "exchange foreigner." Ex hypothesi the plaintiff was "an exchange foreigner," and the lawyer agreed that there was nothing in Czech law to prevent a transaction of any nature taking place between two "exchange foreigners." Therefore, it was quite clear that, if
- D the plaintiff had a current account in London with the defendant bank, there was no reason why the defendant bank should not honour his cheques, because they were both "exchange foreigners" and the law of Czechoslovakia could not prohibit transactions between two people who were not subject to its jurisdiction. It is said that, by the terms of the contract between Mrs. Frankman, whose representative the plaintiff is, and the bank, these bonds could only be
- E demanded in Prague, and, therefore, it would follow that, as the contract provided that the bank were only bound to deliver those bonds in Prague, the handing over of the bonds would, in effect, be a transfer by the Czech bank, an "exchange citizen," to an "exchange foreigner" and, therefore, would be prohibited. The case seems to me to come down to a due consideration and construction of the Conditions of Business which were sent by the
- F bank to Mrs. Frankman, indicating to her the terms under which they were holding her bonds for safe custody.

- I will now look at Condition 11 a little more closely. The condition which that imposed with regard to securities bought by the bank elsewhere than in Prague was that stocks bought on a stock exchange other than that of Prague would not be "sent to us unless the customer has ordered the transmission thereof at his own expense and risk, but will" be left "deposited with our
- G correspondent," which must mean the correspondent who has bought the securities for the customer—in this case, as the debentures were bought on the London Stock Exchange, the correspondent would be the London correspondent and we know that the London correspondent was the London branch—"where they shall be subject to the laws of the respective country." In other
- H words, there we shall leave the certificates or other documents of title to all stocks and securities which we have bought and they will be subject to the laws of that country. Condition 50, on which so much reliance was placed, was this :

"The place of performance and payment in respect of all obligations resulting from the business connection with us shall be considered to be the place of that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transaction with the customer, except in so far, however, as any special stipulation has been made in this connection."

It was agreed by the Czech lawyer who gave evidence that "department" would include a branch of the bank. Counsel for the plaintiff has argued, and I think that there is a great deal to be said for the argument, that, when you examine the whole of these conditions and see what I may call the fasciculi of the different paragraphs, that Condition 50 is not dealing with any such matters as the buying of stocks and shares and that, indeed, the fasciculi of clauses, some of which have preceded it and some of which succeed it, show that it is really only dealing with the payment and collection of moneys. It is well-known law that, if a person has a current account with a bank which has been opened and kept for him at a particular branch, the transactions with the bank, so far as that current account is concerned, must be carried out with that branch. If I bank at Branch A, subject to any special arrangement for enabling customers to cash cheques at other branches, I cannot demand that my cheques shall be cashed anywhere else. If I take a cheque into a branch of my bank where my account is not kept, the bank is not bound to honour the cheque, and they do not commit any breach of their contract with me by saying: "You must take your cheque to the branch at which you keep your account." In the same way, if I want to pay money into my bank, in the absence of any special facility which the bank may, but is not bound to, give, I must pay it into my account at my branch of the bank. Transactions, so far as current accounts are concerned, must in the absence of special arrangements be conducted at the branch at which the account is kept and so must transactions with regard to bills of exchange in which the customer is interested. There is a great deal to be said, though I do not feel it necessary to give a concluded opinion on the matter, for the view that, when one regards the context in which one finds Condition 50 in these Conditions of Business, it has nothing to do with the deposit of these debentures, but, assuming that it does apply to debentures and not merely to the operation of the current account, let us see how it fits in with Condition 11. A customer orders the bank in Prague to buy shares for him on the London Stock Exchange, according to their Conditions of Business. The shares are bought on a stock exchange other than that of Prague, and, therefore, they will not be sent to Prague unless the customer has ordered that that should be done and then it would have to be done at his expense and risk. Otherwise they will be left in London at the risk and expense of the customer. They will be "deposited with our correspondent" and they will then be subject to the laws prevailing in the foreign country in question. Once the shares have been bought, they will lie with the correspondent in London, and, if they are to be kept there for safe custody, they will then be held for safe custody, because they will be the property of the customer being held by the bank who do not pretend that they have a lien on them or that they are holding them as security in any way. How does that work in with Condition 50? That condition says: "The place of performance in respect of all obligations resulting from the business connection with us shall be considered to be the place of that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transaction." So far as safe custody of the shares is concerned, this is being carried out by the branch in London. It is said that Mrs. Frankman had no account in London. Be it so, but her shares were in London because the bank stipulated that they should be left there unless she gave special orders to the contrary. Those shares were to be held in London according to the laws of England. Therefore, any consideration of what is the proper law of the contract is provided by the condition itself and the proper law of the country is the law of England and not the law of Czechoslovakia.

Once it is established, as it is, by the evidence of the lawyer who was called by the defendants, that, even if Czech law governed this matter, there is nothing in that law to make illegal a transaction between two "exchange foreigners" and that both of these parties were "exchange foreigners," no difficulty arises. I think that, as soon as these bonds were bought, any transaction which would be governed by Czechoslovak law came to an end. The contract of purchase, being made in Czechoslovakia, was, undoubtedly, governed by Czechoslovak law, but thereafter the bank, in fulfilment of their mandate, were holding by their branch or department in London these debentures for safe custody. I think that thereupon the debentures became subject to English law, and, accordingly, as the plaintiff has proved his title to them, in my opinion, he is entitled to maintain this action.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I agree. This appeal would seem to turn on the application to the facts of this case of the rules of English private international law. Two conclusions, among others, seem to me to result from that application—first, that the contract entered into between Mrs. Frankman and the bank in 1938 was governed by Czechoslovak law, the lex loci contractus, but, secondly, that, if and so far as, construed by that law, the contract provided for obligations to be performed in England, such obligations were intended to be governed by, and should be treated by English courts as governed by, the municipal law of this country, the lex loci solutionis. Such obligations are, accordingly, not affected by Czech domestic legislation, such as the Exchange or Currency Regulations which have played a great part in this case (even if those regulations were otherwise applicable to the case, having regard to the evidence about the transaction being between two "exchange foreigners"). That being so, the appeal turns mainly on whether the material obligations were to be performed in Czechoslovakia or in England. What were those obligations? The obligations of the Prague Bank under the contract were (a) to keep in safe custody the three bonds belonging to Mrs. Frankman and later to the plaintiff, (b) to re-deliver them to the owner against a valid demand for re-delivery, and (c) to perform each of those obligations in accordance with the written conditions of the contract which were furnished to Mrs. Frankman at the time when it was concluded, and acquiesced in by her. The Prague Bank performed the first of those obligations, that of safe custody (as it was entitled by Condition 11 to do, in the case of securities of this class), vicariously, that is, not by getting the bonds transmitted to its Prague headquarters office, but by causing or permitting its London branch to retain physical possession of them. If it had elected to discharge its obligations as custodian by assuming and retaining physical possession in Prague, it might well have been necessary for the owner of the securities, the plaintiff, to have made a demand in Prague as a condition precedent to his right to re-delivery. Since, however, the bank asserted its contractual right under Condition 11 to have the bonds retained in the hands of its London branch, it seems to me implicit in its election to do so and in the arrangement generally that the depositor, who was at the material time in England, could validly assert his right to re-delivery by a demand addressed to the defendants' London branch where the bonds were instead of resorting to the circuitry of addressing such a demand to the Prague branch where they were not. I, therefore, think that the demand was valid and the refusal to re-deliver unjustified.

It is arguable that a similar result might be deduced or flows from an application of the provisions of Condition 50 to the facts. The obligation to re-deliver falls within the literal scope of the words "all obligations resulting from the business connection with us," that is, with the bank. "The place of performance," further to quote the language of Condition 50, "is the place of that department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transaction with the customer, except in so far as any special stipulation has been made in this connection." It seems to me that a possible construction of "the department of our establishment which has carried out the relevant transaction with the customer" is the London department or branch, on which the actual custody of the bonds has devolved. It is true that there is a possible ambiguity, as these words might also mean the department or branch which negotiated the contract, that is, the Prague branch of the Bank. The Czech lawyer called for the defendants assumed that it meant this last, without, apparently, appreciating that there is any possible ambiguity or possible application of the principle contra proferentem. On the whole, I would not rest my conclusion on Condition 50. There is great force in the argument of counsel for the defendant that the words "transaction with the customer" do not fit in comfortably with the construction which I have suggested—a construction which rather requires "a transaction for the customer" if it is to relate to services de facto rendered to the customer as against services stipulated for—but, while Condition 50 may not help, I do not think that it hinders the plaintiff or invalidates the conclusion drawn from Condition 11. Condition 50, in spite of the apparent generality of its language when it speaks of "all obligations," comes at the end of a number of provisions quite unconnected with the custody of securities, whereas Condition 11 deals specifically, not only with the custody of securities, but with that of securities of the limited class here involved. For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be allowed.

SINGLETON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs in both courts. Judgment for the plaintiff for the return of the debentures mentioned in the statement of claim and an order that the defendants do execute all documents necessary to transfer them in to the name of the plaintiff.

Solicitors: W. R. Bennett & Co., agents for Barrow-Sicree & Co., Manchester (for the plaintiff); Freshfields (for the defendants).

Applied. MUNRO v. MUNRO. [1950]
1 All E.R. 832.

McGOWAN v. McGOWAN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Hodson and Pilcher, JJ.), October 13, 14, 22, 1948.]

Desertion—Maintenance—Provision of matrimonial home—Reasonable accommodation offered—Sharing of husband's parents' home—Wife securing flat elsewhere—Husband's refusal to occupy flat.

On Aug. 4, 1945, the parties were married, and at that time the husband was serving with the Royal Marines. The wife continued to live with her mother, but stayed at the home of the husband's parents when the husband was on leave. In March, 1946, the husband was demobilised and he and his wife went to live at his parents' house. After three days the wife returned to her mother. The house of the husband's parents at all times remained open to her, but she refused to return there because she was not prepared to live with her husband's parents. In October, 1947, the wife of her own volition secured the tenancy of a flat and asked the husband to live there with her. He refused, and the wife issued a summons alleging desertion by the husband and wilful neglect to maintain her. The justices considered that the wife had no reasonable ground for leaving her husband's parents' house, but were of the opinion that the husband was unreasonable in refusing to live in the flat found by the wife. Accordingly, they dismissed the charge of desertion, but found that the husband was guilty of wilful neglect to maintain the wife. On appeal:—

HELD: the wife, having left the husband unreasonably, did not succeed in establishing that he had not provided her with a reasonable home by finding accommodation elsewhere which he was unwilling to accept, and she had not, therefore, proved that the husband was not fulfilling his obligation to maintain her, and the appeal must be allowed.

Jackson v. Jackson (1932) (146 L.T. 406), applied.

[AS TO OBLIGATION TO MAINTAIN SPOUSE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 16, pp. 608-610, paras. 951-955; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 75-78, Nos. 590-606.]

A Cases referred to :

(1) Millichamp v. Millichamp, (1931), 146 L.T. 96; 95 J.P. 207; Digest Supp.

(2) Jackson v. Jackson, (1932), 146 L.T. 406; 96 J.P. 97; Digest Supp.

(3) Mansey v. Mansey, [1940] 2 All E.R. 424; [1940] P. 139; 109 L.J.P. 83; 163 L.T. 157; 2nd Digest Supp.

B

(4) King v. King, [1941] 2 All E.R. 103; [1942] P. 1; 111 L.J.P. 90; 167 L.T. 241; 2nd Digest Supp.

(5) Dunn v. Dunn, [1948] 2 All E.R. 822.

APPEAL from an order of justices for the city of Liverpool made on Mar. 19, 1948, whereby the husband was found guilty of wilful neglect to maintain the wife and ordered to pay her 15s. 6d. weekly for her maintenance. The husband's appeal to the Divisional Court of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division was allowed. The facts appear in the judgment of HODSON, J.

Ormrod for the husband.

G. R. F. Morris for the wife.

Cur. adv. vult.

D

Oct. 22. HODSON, J.: The parties were married on Aug. 4, 1945, and there is one child, which was born on Oct. 15, 1946, after the separation of its parents. At the time of the marriage the husband was serving in the Royal Marines and the wife continued to live with her mother, save that on his leaves she stayed with him at his parents' house, 74, Grovehurst Avenue, Liverpool, which is the only matrimonial home they have ever shared. In March, 1946, the husband was demobilised, and the parties went to live at his parents' house. After a few days the wife left, and returned to her mother. Since then this home at the house of the husband's parents has always been open to the wife, but she has consistently refused to return on the ground that she was not prepared to live in her mother-in-law's house. The husband's evidence before the justices was that he did not intend to live at his parents' house permanently, but only until he and his wife got accommodation of their own. In October, 1947, the wife, of her own volition, or, at any rate, without consulting the husband, got the tenancy of a flat at 96, Thurlow House, off Christian Street, Liverpool, and she told the husband of that fact and asked him to come there. This he refused to do, being unwilling to live in the middle of the city, and the wife got her solicitor to write a letter dated Oct. 29, 1947, placing on record what she had done and intimating that action would be taken against the husband if he did not fall in with the proposition that he should take up the tenancy of the flat. This letter having produced no result, a summons was issued alleging desertion of the wife and wilful neglect to maintain her on the part of the husband.

E

F

G

H

The case first came on for hearing on Nov. 21, 1947. It came on again on Nov. 28, 1947, Jan. 9, 1948, Feb. 27, 1948, and Mar. 5, 1948. It was finally adjudicated on on Mar. 19. It is clear that the justices gave very close attention to the evidence and to the questions of law and fact involved, and also to the desirability of effecting a reconciliation between the parties, but all efforts to bring about a reconciliation failed. The husband maintained that he could not be guilty of wilful neglect to maintain, since his wife had deserted him by leaving the matrimonial home which was still open to her. The wife, on the other hand, maintained that she could not be expected to return to the home so long as the husband's parents remained in it and in the circumstances it was unreasonable for the husband to refuse to consider the alternative home she had taken at 96, Thurlow House. The justices dismissed the summons based on desertion, but made the order appealed against on the ground that the husband had been guilty of wilful neglect to maintain his wife.

The case has to be approached keeping in mind that the common law obligation of a husband to maintain his wife is prima facie discharged by the provision of a home for her, with all that that entails in the way of her maintenance and that of any children there may be. There is no obligation to provide maintenance in a separate home merely at the option of the wife. The justices not only dismissed the summons based on desertion, but also, in their reasons for the decision at which they arrived, stated that they were not satisfied that the wife had reasonable grounds for leaving her mother-in-law's house in the first instance.

Various authorities were referred to before the justices and before this court. In the first of these, Millichamp v. Millichamp (1), a decision of the Divisional Court, an order of the justices for maintenance on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain was upheld. There the justices, in a case where the wife had left the husband who was living in his mother's house, held that the husband had brought about the separation by putting his mother first instead of his wife, so that it was unreasonable for him to expect his wife to continue to live in that house under the conditions involved. This was tantamount to a finding that the husband had not maintained, or, indeed, offered to maintain, his wife in a reasonable home in the circumstances and the finding was upheld. In Jackson v. Jackson (2) the husband had taken a house next door to his mother's house, and the wife had left him there. LORD MERRIVALE, P., put the question thus (146 L.T. 407) :

"Is it right to say that the conditions imposed on the wife were unbearable for her or any other wife, conditions which it was not competent for a reasonable husband to set up? Were they such conditions that a reasonable wife, being so treated by an unreasonable husband, could not be expected to proceed with the conjugal life?"

This question he answered in the negative, and the order of the justices based on wilful neglect to maintain was discharged.

It seems to me that the justices in this case have rightly approached the problem in the same way as LORD MERRIVALE, and have answered the question similarly in so far as they have found that the wife had no reasonable ground for leaving her mother-in-law's house in 1946. The other cases referred to, namely, Mansey v. Mansey (3) and King v. King (4), deal with the right of the husband to choose the matrimonial home, but in each case it is clearly recognised that the husband must act reasonably. LORD MERRIMAN, P., in the latter case, made it clear that the husband's right to choose the home is not to be erected into a proposition of law so as to shift the burden of proof to the wife in a case where the husband alleges desertion without cause. Each case must be determined on its own facts, having regard to the circumstances in which the parties find themselves, paying due regard, for example, to any agreement on the subject which they may have made.

Since the hearing of this appeal the same topic has been discussed in the Court of Appeal in Dunn v. Dunn (5). DENNING, L.J., is reported to have enunciated the same proposition, adding the words ([1948] 2 All E.R. 823) :

"The decision where the home should be is a decision which affects both the parties and their children. It is their duty to decide it by agreement, by give and take, and not by the imposition of the will of one over the other. Each is entitled to an equal voice in the ordering of the affairs which are their common concern. Neither has a casting vote, though, to be sure, they should try so to arrange their affairs that they spend their time together as a family and not apart. If such an arrangement is frustrated by the unreasonableness of one or the other, and this leads to a separation between them, then the party who has produced the separation by reason of his or her unreasonable behaviour is guilty of desertion."

A It is true that the LORD JUSTICE said that, in his opinion, neither spouse had a casting vote in the choice of the home, but that is but another way of expressing the proposition that neither has, as a matter of law, the right to choose the matrimonial home.

B In claiming that a husband has wilfully neglected to maintain her, a wife has to prove her case just as much as if she were seeking to establish desertion without cause, and I do not think that it is inconsistent with the quoted observations of the LORD JUSTICE to recognise that a wife who, as in this case, has been found to have acted unreasonably in leaving her husband, may find herself in difficulty thereafter in seeking to prove that he is in breach of his obligation to maintain her. She can hardly complain of lack of "give and take" on his part if she rents a dwelling-house without consulting him as to its locality or anything else, and then presents him with an ultimatum directing him to live there with her or take the consequences. Here, although the justices have found that the husband acted reasonably in providing the home from which his wife left him, they have found him unreasonable in refusing to set up home with his wife and child at 96, Thurlow House, and based their decision against him on this last ground. I think it is impossible to sustain the second part of their finding so as to justify an order against the husband on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain the wife. So long as the husband's obligation to maintain his wife remains, he can fulfil this obligation by providing his wife with a reasonable home. She does not succeed in establishing that he has not provided her with a reasonable home by showing that, having left him unreasonably, she has, by her independent action, found accommodation somewhere else which he is unwilling to accept. To put the matter in another way, having deserted him in the first place, she does not bring her desertion to an end by offering to live with her husband elsewhere than in the place of his choice, unless she can show that the place of his choice is not a reasonable home for him to offer her, having regard to all the circumstances. In view of the justices' findings as to the original leaving, I do not think that there was any evidence here to justify them in making an order which is really based on the husband's failure to provide his wife with a reasonable home. In my judgment, therefore, the appeal succeeds, and the order of the justices must be discharged.

F
G
H PILCHER, J.: I am satisfied in this case that there was abundant evidence on which the justices were entitled to find, as they did, that the wife acted unreasonably in March, 1946, when, after three days' sojourn in the home provided by her husband under his parents' roof, she left him. At that time the husband had only just been demobilised, his parents' house was open to him, and it would almost certainly have been very difficult for him to have provided an alternative home elsewhere. The wife thus put herself in the wrong. Since March, 1946, the home offered by the husband has always been open to her. She did not invoke in evidence the birth of the child in October, 1946, as an event which materially altered the circumstances in reference to the suitability of the accommodation offered by her husband. The authorities referred to by my Lord make it clear that neither husband nor wife has any legal right to dictate the whereabouts of the matrimonial home. In the event of any unfortunate difference of view the rights of the parties must be governed by reason. At one time I felt considerable doubt whether the mere passage of time from March, 1946, to November, 1947, giving, as it did to the husband, an opportunity of seeking accommodation other than his parents' house, coupled with the fact that he appeared to have made little, if any, effort to seek such accommodation, did, in itself, have an important bearing on the reasonableness of his behaviour. After giving the matter the best consideration of which I am capable, however, I have now come to the conclusion that there was not sufficient evidence covering the period March, 1946, to November, 1947, to justify the justices in coming to the conclusion, which they did, that the husband was unreasonable in failing to join his wife at the flat in Thurlow House, which she rented without consulting him in any way. Since March, 1946, the parties have unfortunately remained almost at arm's length. There has been no give and take. Each party has attempted to impose his will on the other. The wife still refuses to make any real trial of married life in the only home offered by her husband, and, as I say, having considered the matter carefully, I agree with my Lord that there was no evidence before the magistrates as to what took place between March, 1946, and November, 1947, which justified them in taking the unfavourable view which they did with regard to the husband's conduct. That being so, I agree with my Lord that this appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Helder, Roberts, Giles & Co., for John A. Behn, Twyford & Reece, Liverpool (for the husband); Mawby, Barrie & Letts, for Silverman & Livermore, Liverpool (for the wife).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

HORN v. MINISTER OF FOOD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Morris, J.), October 27, 28, November 8, 1948.]

Sale of Goods—Implied warranty of fitness—Variation of implied rights—Avoidance of agreement—"Perishing" of goods before risk passes to buyer—Sale of potatoes to Minister of Food—Buyer's duty to give delivery instructions—Risk of deterioration with buyer—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (c. 71), ss. 7, 14 (2), 20, 55.

In January, 1943, after inspection on behalf of the buyer, 33 tons of Majestic ware potatoes in a clamp were sold by a farmer to the Minister of Food at an agreed price. Delivery instructions were to be given by the Minister in the ensuing May, June or July. The agreement provided inter alia as follows: By Condition 1: "The seller will exercise all reasonable care in the storage of the potatoes forming the subject of the agreement and will protect potatoes in clamps against frost and winter weather by means of adequate coverings of straw and soil and in the event of any excessive deterioration of the potatoes will notify in writing the appropriate area potato supervisor forthwith of any such deterioration." By Condition 2 the property in the potatoes was to pass to the buyer on delivery according to his instructions. By Condition 4: "In the case of a tonnage contract, notwithstanding that the property in the potatoes shall have passed in accordance with Condition 2, the buyer, having taken a sample of any consignment of potatoes on arrival at its destination by rail or road and being satisfied that such sample fails to correspond to the description of the potatoes sold, may reject the whole consignment or any part thereof or accept the same at a fair value." By Condition 6, no further payment after the advance payment was to be made until delivery instructions had been completed by the claimant. On June 21, 1943, the farmer discovered a seam of rot in the potatoes and on the same day the area supervisor sent him delivery instructions by letter received the following day. On June 23 the farmer sent the area supervisor notice of the deterioration of the potatoes. On June 25 the area supervisor inspected them, and, as they were no longer fit for use, cancelled the delivery instructions. It was found as a fact that the farmer had carried out his duty of exercising care in the storage of the potatoes and in protecting them against the weather.

A
HELD : (i) section 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, did not operate so that there was an implied term in the contract that the potatoes should be merchantable, since that section was subject (inter alia) to the provisions of s. 55 of the Act and the parties had expressly contemplated that there might be excessive deterioration of the potatoes.

B
(ii) section 7 of the Act did not apply because the potatoes still answered to the description "potatoes," however grave the deterioration in their condition, and, therefore, they could not be said to have "perished before the risk passed to the buyer" within that section, nor did they "fail to correspond to the description of the potatoes sold" within Condition 4.

C
(iii) the seller having complied with the obligations imposed on him by Condition 1, by the terms of that condition the risk of deterioration was with the buyer, the buyer had failed to give effective, subsisting delivery instructions, which he was obliged to do under the contract, and, therefore, the buyer was liable to the seller either in damages or for the price of the goods.

[FOR THE SALE OF GOODS ACT, 1893, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 17, pp. 612.]

D Case referred to :

(1) Simmons v. Swift, (1826), 5 B. & C. 857 ; 8 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 693 ; 5 L.J.O.S.K.B. 10 ; 39 Digest 484, 1042.

MOTION to set aside award.

E
F
The seller was a farmer farming 64 acres at Bulcroft Farm, Leverington Common, Wisbech, Cambridgeshire. In 1942 the buyer, the Minister of Food, had decided that a potato reserve should be provided under the control of area potato supervisors. On Dec. 29, 1942, a clamp of Majestic ware potatoes situated on field 298 on the seller's land was inspected by a potato merchant employed by the local area potato supervisor inter alia to inspect and report on potatoes to be purchased by the Minister and to pass on delivery instructions from the supervisor to the seller. On Jan. 13, 1943, the seller entered into a contract with the Minister of Food, under which the Minister purchased 33 tons of Majestic ware potatoes in the clamp. Delivery instructions were to be given during May, June, or July, 1943. An advance payment of £132 was made by the buyer to the seller under the contract. On June 21 the seller opened clamp 298 and found a seam of rot. On June 22 he received delivery instructions from the area potato supervisor. At that time he had given no written notice of deterioration to the supervisor, the first notice of deterioration being given by letter dated June 23. On June 25 the supervisor inspected the clamp of potatoes and forthwith cancelled the delivery instructions.

G
H
In his points of claim, as amended, the seller claimed £232 5s., the price of 33 tons of potatoes, or, alternatively that sum as damages by reason of the failure of the buyer to give delivery instructions under the terms of the contract whereby the whole of the 33 tons of potatoes rotted before they could be delivered. At the hearing the seller was permitted to amend his claim by alleging that, if such instructions were held to have been given, they had been cancelled orally by the potato merchant, and the cancellation had been confirmed by the area potato inspector on June 25. The buyer said that delivery instructions were given to the seller, but that he had failed to deliver any potatoes in accordance with the contract, or at all, and that he had failed to notify the buyer of deterioration of the potatoes before receiving delivery instructions. He also said the seller had failed to take reasonable care in the storage of the potatoes and did not deliver ware potatoes.

The arbitrator found : (i) On June 25 the whole of the potatoes were useless and could not be delivered. (ii) The seller had performed his part under the contract by properly caring for the potatoes and by giving notice in writing of excessive deterioration as soon as he observed it. (iii) The buyer did not fail or refuse to give delivery instructions, but, in fact, gave them before the seller gave notice of deterioration and cancelled them on June 25. He held that there was no implied term in the contract that the cancellation of delivery instructions should operate as a completion of the delivery instructions so as to pass the property in the potatoes to the buyer and entitle the seller to payment of the whole of the purchase price. He, therefore, dismissed the claim with costs. MORRIS, J., now held that the buyer had committed a breach of contract.

Quintin Hogg for the seller.

Boileau for the buyer.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 8. MORRIS, J. : The questions which are raised by this motion depend for their determination on the construction of the contract made between the parties on Jan. 13, 1943. On behalf of the seller it is submitted that the legal result that should follow from the facts found by the learned arbitrator is that he (the seller) is entitled to the sum of £232 5s. 0d. either as damages for the failure of the buyer to give delivery instructions or as the price of goods sold, the delivery of which was not required by the buyer. If this is the correct legal conclusion which should flow from the findings of the arbitrator, then it is urged that error in law is manifest on the face of the award.

There is no need for me to repeat the facts and findings which are recorded with clarity in the award. In my judgment, the contract placed the buyer under obligation to give delivery instructions. He was required to issue these in May, June, or July, 1943. The seller entered into an obligation which by Condition 1 was expressed in the following words :

"The seller will exercise all reasonable care in the storage of the potatoes forming the subject of the agreement and will protect potatoes in clamps against frost and winter weather by means of adequate coverings of straw and soil and in the event of any excessive deterioration of the potatoes will notify in writing the appropriate area potato supervisor forthwith of any such deterioration."

On June 22, 1943, the seller received delivery instructions. It was not suggested that those instructions could have been, or ought to have been, carried out by June 25. On that date the delivery instructions were cancelled. No substituted instructions or later instructions were ever given. The finding of fact of the arbitrator that the buyer did not fail or refuse to give delivery instructions is, of course, unimpeachable, and, indeed, it is found that delivery instructions were given and that they were received on June 22, but when the further finding of fact that the delivery instructions were cancelled on June 25 is conjoined to the earlier finding of fact, the clear result follows that no effective subsisting delivery instructions were given. Some reason must be assigned for this by the buyer, and then such reason must be examined to see whether it affords legal excuse for the failure to give delivery instructions or for the failure to pay. It is clear what was the reason. It was that excessive deterioration of the potatoes had taken place. By letter dated June 23 the seller notified the buyer of this. It is found as a fact that the seller discharged the obligations imposed on him by Condition 1. The question then arises whether, on the facts as found, the buyer was excused from giving delivery instructions or from paying for the potatoes.

In my judgment, it cannot be said that the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 14 (2), operated so that there was an implied condition that the potatoes should be of merchantable quality. Section 14 contains the words: "Subject to the provisions of this Act," and s. 55 of the Act is in the following terms:

A "Where any right, duty, or liability would arise under a contract of sale by implication of law, it may be negatived or varied by express agreement or by the course of dealing between the parties, or by usage, if the usage be such as to bind both parties to the contract."

The potatoes were inspected by a representative of the buyer on Dec. 29, 1942. The contract was made in the circumstances detailed in the award. There was a contemplation that before the giving of delivery instructions there might be not only deterioration, but even excessive deterioration, of the potatoes, which, it is to be noted, were the particular potatoes inspected and which (as the contract shows) had been reported on and were located at a named farm. In these circumstances there is no room in this contract for an implied condition that the goods should be of merchantable quality. Furthermore, it is to be observed that s. 14 (2) only applies where goods are bought by description. Though the proviso to the sub-section indicates that goods which have been examined may, nevertheless, be bought by description, it would appear to be very questionable whether the sale of the potatoes at Bulcroft Farm, which a potato merchant employed by the buyer had inspected and reported on, was ever a sale by description. The conclusion which I have expressed makes it unnecessary to pursue this aspect of the matter further.

D It must next be considered whether the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, s. 7, have any applicability to the facts as found. The terms of that section are as follows:

E "Where there is an agreement to sell specific goods, and subsequently the goods, without any fault on the part of the seller or buyer, perish before the risk passes to the buyer, the agreement is thereby avoided."

The finding of the learned arbitrator is that on June 25 the whole of the potatoes were "useless and could not be delivered." The arbitrator does not find that the potatoes had ceased to exist or were no longer in a form that would permit of their being called "potatoes," but he finds that the quality of the potatoes had so far deteriorated that they had become "useless and could not be delivered." The finding is that the potatoes had become rotten with the result that they could not be used. It is not found that the use of the word "potatoes" was inapposite in reference to them. On the contrary, the award refers to "the condition of the potatoes on June 25." It would be wrong, therefore, to say that they did not answer to the description of "potatoes," however grave was the deterioration of their condition. In my judgment, s. 7 is not applicable to the facts as found, but, even if the potatoes had perished within the meaning of the section, it is to be observed that the section only deals with cases where goods perish "before the risk passes to the buyer," and, in my view the risks of deterioration and also of excessive deterioration were with the buyer, provided always that the seller complied with the obligations imposed on him by Condition 1. The position is, therefore, either that the buyer is liable because of a failure to give delivery instructions, or, if excessive deterioration happened without the fault of the seller which made delivery impossible, the buyer is liable because the contract placed this risk on him.

H It was, however, further contended on behalf of the buyer that it would have been futile for him to give delivery instructions since, by reason of Condition 4, he could thereafter have rejected the whole consignment. It was said, therefore, that the giving of delivery instructions was a ritual that need not have been performed. Condition 4, so far as relevant, is as follows :

"In the case of a tonnage contract, notwithstanding that the property in the potatoes shall have passed in accordance with Condition 2, the buyer, having taken a sample of any consignment of potatoes on arrival at its destination by rail or road and being satisfied that such sample fails to correspond to the description of the potatoes sold, may reject the whole consignment or any part thereof or accept the same at a fair value."

Condition 2 provided that the property in the potatoes under a tonnage contract passed to the buyer on delivery. In my judgment, this submission fails for the reason that it is not found that the potatoes did not correspond to the description of the potatoes sold. The fact that in regard to their quality and condition there was very serious deterioration did not withdraw from the potatoes their classification and description as ware potatoes of the variety known as Majestic. Condition 4 deals with description as such and not with condition or quality and in this contract must be read having regard to Condition 1. So also must Condition 2. The provisions of the Sale of Goods Act, s. 20, do not affect the conclusions which I have expressed. That section provides as follows :

"Unless otherwise agreed, the goods remain at the seller's risk until the property therein is transferred to the buyer, but when the property therein is transferred to the buyer, the goods are at the buyer's risk whether delivery has been made or not."

Though the property is, under Condition 2 of the contract, to pass on delivery, the risk of deterioration, even excessive in extent, is one which, by reason of the express agreement contained in Condition 1, is with the buyer. The question as to the incidence of risks of other kinds in regard to the potatoes is not raised and does not call for present determination. The decision in Simmons v. Swift (1) does not afford guidance in the present case which, in my judgment, must be decided on a consideration of its own special terms and conditions.

During the argument before me questions were discussed as to what results should follow on the giving of a notice by the seller of excessive deterioration in accordance with Condition 1. Reference was made to the award, where it is stated :

"Counsel for the buyer agreed that provided the seller had carried out all the terms of his contract and there was unreasonable delay by the buyer in giving delivery instructions after proper notice of deterioration by the seller, then in such circumstances the buyer would be liable in some damages which would have to be assessed by me."

Counsel for the buyer, in his argument, said that for the purpose of the present dispute he had at the arbitration agreed that the buyer would, after a proper notice under Condition 1 had been sent to him by the seller, be under an implied obligation to give delivery instructions, but counsel sought to distinguish between this and accepting delivery. I do not think that it is necessary for me to decide the question whether there is an implied term in the contract. If a buyer is informed that there is excessive deterioration in the goods which he has contracted to take, then in the exercise of his rights he will in all probability immediately give delivery instructions. Common sense suggests that this is the course he would follow, but it may well be that this is a matter for the buyer. If the seller has not exercised all reasonable care in the storage of the goods, the seller would be in breach of contract. If the seller has fully complied with his contractual obligations, the buyer has no excuse if he fails to give delivery instructions. He may state that he does not require delivery, but then he remains liable to pay what he has contracted to pay. If he expressly or impliedly states that he will not give delivery instructions then he commits an anticipatory breach. If because of deterioration there cannot be delivery and Condition 1 has been obeyed by the seller, then it is for the buyer to pay. The present case does not raise the question what would be the position if notice of excessive deterioration were given before the month of May, but presumably the seller would be entirely content to receive delivery instructions.

A For the reasons which I have given, the legal conclusion that should follow from the facts as found is that the seller should succeed, and, therefore, the concluding sentences of the award are erroneous in law. The liability of the buyer does not depend on some implied term that property passes if delivery instructions are cancelled, and I do not consider that there was any such implied term. The liability of the purchaser is, in my judgment, on the basis B which I have indicated. It was conceded that some normal wastage of tonnage would be inevitable. The award contains the following passage: "He," namely, learned counsel for the seller at the arbitration, "said that allowance should be made for normal waste in the whole tonnage amounting to some 10 per cent. covering the whole period allowed for delivery instructions up to the end of July, and after some discussion between counsel the figure arrived C at became £232 5s. 0d. as the amount claimed." The precise manner of working out this figure is not revealed, and I can, therefore, neither affirm nor reject the figure as a figure. The method of approach is, however, in my judgment, correct, and, provided that the figure is correct, I consider that the legal result of the arbitrator's findings was that the seller was entitled to that sum either by way of damages or as the price of goods the delivery of D which was waived or (in special circumstances covered by the contract) could not be given. In these circumstances, the proper course is for me to remit the matter to the arbitrator for re-consideration.

Case remitted.

Solicitors: Metcalfe, Copeman & Pettefar, agents for Cozens-Hardy & Jewson, Norwich (for the seller); Treasury Solicitor (for the buyer).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

COMMERCIAL STRUCTURES, LTD. v. R. A. BRIGGS (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

F [COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 15, 16, 1948.]

Income Tax—Additional assessments—“If the surveyor discovers . . . that a person chargeable . . . has been undercharged” —“Discovers” —Mistake in general law—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), s. 125 (1).

G The Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 125 (1) provides: "If the surveyor discovers that any properties or profits chargeable to tax have been omitted from the first assessments; or that a person chargeable has not delivered any statement, or has not delivered a full and proper statement, or has not been assessed to tax, or has been undercharged in the first assessments . . . then and in every such case (i) where the tax is H chargeable under sched. A, B, or E: . . . (b) If the first assessments have been signed and allowed, the surveyor shall certify the particulars to the General Commissioners, who shall sign and allow an additional first assessment in accordance therewith: Provided that any such additional first assessment shall be subject to appeal and other proceedings as in the case of a first assessment."

The taxpayers were owners of certain premises which, in September, 1939, were requisitioned by the Minister of Works under the Defence Regulations. This entitled the taxpayers to a compensation rent under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, s. 2, and a sum of £4,940 was arrived at by agreement. In assessing this figure for tax purposes, the inspector of taxes made the statutory deduction of one-sixth from that sum, leaving £4,113 as the figure on which tax under sched. A would be payable. Payment of tax on this basis was made until April, 1945, when the inspector became aware that the compensation rent was not a rack rent, since, by the provisions of s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act of 1939, the Minister of Works was liable to pay a sum equal to the cost of making good any damage to the building during his occupation. In purported pursuance of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 125 (1), the inspector thereupon made additional assessments, increasing the net assessment to £4,525.

HELD: although no new fact or circumstance had been ascertained by the inspector when he made the additional assessments, he had made a "discovery" within the meaning of s. 125 (1) when he found that a mistake had been made with regard to the effect of the general law on a particular set of facts.

Dictum of LORD NORMAND in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Mackinlay's Trustees (1938 S.C. 771), approved.

Dictum of ROWLATT, J., in Anderton & Halstead, Ltd. v. Birrell ([1932] 1 K.B. 281; 146 L.T. 142), not adopted.

British Sugar Manufacturers, Ltd. v. Harris ([1938] 1 All E.R. 149; [1938] 2 K.B. 220; 159 L.T. 365); discussed.

Decision of ATKINSON, J. ([1947] 2 All E.R. 659), affirmed.

[AS TO THE MEANING OF "DISCOVERS," see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 17, pp. 339, 340, para. 689 and Supplement; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Supplement, Income Tax, 592b-592e.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) R. v. Kensington Income Tax Comrs., [1913] 3 K.B. 870; 83 L.J.K.B. 364; 109 L.T. 708; 6 Tax Cas. 279; on appeal, sub nom. Kensington Income Tax Comrs. v. Aramayo, [1916] 1 A.C. 215; 84 L.J.K.B. 2169; 113 L.T. 1083; 38 Digest 121, 888.
- (2) Anderton & Halstead, Ltd. v. Birrell, [1932] 1 K.B. 271; 101 L.J.K.B. 219; 146 L.T. 139; 16 Tax Cas. 200; Digest Supp.
- (3) Williams v. Grundy's Trustees, [1934] 1 K.B. 524; 103 L.J.K.B. 204; 150 L.T. 378; 18 Tax Cas. 271; Digest Supp.
- (4) British Sugar Manufacturers, Ltd. v. Harris, [1938] 1 All E.R. 149; [1938] 2 K.B. 220; 107 L.J.K.B. 472; 159 L.T. 365; 21 Tax Cas. 528; Digest Supp.
- (5) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Mackinlay's Trustees, 1938, S.C. 765; 22 Tax Cas. 305; Digest Supp.

APPEAL from a decision of ATKINSON, J., on a Case stated by General Commissioners of Income Tax.

The taxpayers had originally been assessed under sched. A on a gross annual value equal to a compensation rent to which they were entitled under the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939, in respect of property which had been requisitioned during the war, less one-sixth. The gross annual value was taken under the mistaken impression that the compensation rent was a rack rent, whereas, in fact, it was less than a rack rent. Full information was before the inspector when the first assessment was made, but, on the mistake being discovered, he made additional assessments under s. 125 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The taxpayers appealed to the General Commissioners against these additional assessments, on the ground that there was no power under the section to make them. The General Commissioners dismissed the taxpayers' appeal, as did ATKINSON, J. The Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision.

N. C. Armitage for the taxpayers.

Donovan, K.C., J. H. Stamp and R. P. Hills for the Inspector of Taxes.

TUCKER, L.J. : This is an appeal from a judgment of ATKINSON, J., whereby he dismissed an appeal by way of Case Stated by the General Commissioners for the Finsbury District. The General Commissioners had confirmed five additional assessments made under sched. "A" on the taxpayers, Commercial Structures, Ltd., in purported pursuance of s. 125 of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The taxpayers were the owners of the upper part of a warehouse in Clerkenwell which was in the course of erection at the outbreak of war. In September, 1939, the building was not finished, but it was taken possession of by the Minister of Works under the Defence Regulations, and, accordingly, what is called a compensation rent became payable under the provisions of the Compensation (Defence) Act, 1939. The actual amount of the payment was arrived at by agreement, and fixed at £4,940 per annum. The relevant section is s. 2 of that Act, which reads as follows :

"(1) The compensation payable under this Act in respect of the taking possession of any land shall be the aggregate of the following sums, that is to say—(a) a sum equal to the rent which might reasonably be expected to be payable by a tenant in occupation of the land, during the period for which possession of the land is retained in the exercise of emergency powers, under a lease granted immediately before the beginning of that period, whereby the tenant undertook to pay all usual tenant's rates and taxes and to bear the cost of the repairs and insurance and the other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain the land in a state to command that rent, and (b) a sum equal to the cost of making good any damage to the land which may have occurred during the period for which possession thereof is so retained (except in so far as the damage has been made good during that period by a person acting on behalf of His Majesty), no account being taken of fair wear and tear or of damage caused by war operations."

Then there are other provisions which are not material to this appeal. Having fixed the sum payable under s. 2 (1) (a), which is called a compensation rent, at £4,940 gross, the inspector made the statutory deduction of one-sixth from that sum, leaving £4,113 as the figure for tax purposes on which sched. A tax would be payable. The taxpayers went on paying on that basis until Apr. 5, 1945, and then the inspector, I will use neutral words, ascertained or became aware of the fact that he had proceeded on an erroneous basis in assenting to the figure of £4,940 as being the correct gross figure for tax purposes before the one-sixth deduction was made. He had, apparently, regarded this compensation rent as if it was a rack rent payable under a lease and had dealt with it accordingly, and he had overlooked the provisions of para. (b) of that sub-section providing for the payment of a lump sum in certain circumstances. Accordingly, he caused additional assessments to be made in which he added to the figure of £4,940 a figure of 10 per cent., representing repairs, producing a gross figure of £5,434, and from that figure he made the statutory deduction, arriving at a net assessment of £4,525. The five additional assessments in question in this appeal were made on that basis. In so proceeding the inspector purported to act in pursuance of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 125 (1) which, so far as material, reads as follows :

"If the surveyor discovers—that any properties or profits chargeable to tax have been omitted from the first assessments; or that a person chargeable has not delivered any statement, or has not delivered a full and proper statement, or has not been assessed to tax, or has been undercharged in the first assessments . . . then and in every such case—(i) where the tax is chargeable under sched. A, B or E . . . (b) If the first assessments have been signed and allowed, the surveyor shall certify the particulars to the General Commissioners, who shall sign and allow an additional first assessment in accordance therewith: Provided that any such additional first assessment shall be subject to appeal and other proceedings as in the case of a first assessments."

The words in that section which are immediately applicable to the present case, are: "If the surveyor discovers that a person chargeable has been undercharged in the first assessment."

It is said here on behalf of the taxpayers that the inspector, who stands for these purposes in the position of the surveyor referred to in s. 125, has not discovered anything within the meaning of that section. All he has done, it is argued, is to alter his mind or to take a different view with regard to the law applicable to the facts and circumstances, all of which were originally before him. It is common ground that no new fact or circumstance had been ascertained by the inspector at the time when he certified the particulars pursuant to the discovery which he said he had made. For the Crown the argument is that, on the plain reading of the section without introducing any additional words, the inspector has discovered that a person chargeable has been undercharged, and it is immaterial whether the discovery is based on the ascertainment of the correct law applicable to the facts and circumstances or whether it is the ascertainment of some new fact or circumstance.

This section has been considered in several cases, but the matter comes before this court without any authority binding on us. I do not propose to refer to the first case which was cited in argument, namely, R. v. Kensington Income Tax Commissioners (1), because, in my view, the facts of that case were so entirely different from those of the present that any observations made there with regard to the meaning to be attached to the word "discovery" really lend no assistance whatever in the solution of the problem with which we are now confronted. I pass, accordingly, to Anderton & Halstead, Ltd. v. Birrell (2), which is the case principally relied on by counsel for the taxpayers. In that case the taxpayers were assessed under sched. D for the years 1921-22 and 1922-23 on the basis of a writing down in two years successively of a doubtful debt. That was done by agreement with the inspector of taxes, who had all the facts before him. Subsequently, by additional first assessments, the writing down of the doubtful debt was disallowed on the ground that it had come to the surveyor's knowledge that the taxpayers had permitted the debtors to increase their indebtedness to them. That had come to his knowledge several years after the time when the agreement had been made. One of the questions which arose in that case was whether in those circumstances the surveyor had made a discovery which entitled him to certify the particulars which would lead to an additional assessment. ROWLATT, J., in giving his judgment, shows what was the real basis of his decision. He quotes r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D (relating to the point in question), and goes on ([1932] 1 K.B. 282):

"What the statute requires, therefore, is an estimate to what extent a debt is bad, and this is for the purpose of a profit and loss account. Such an estimate is not a prophecy to be judged by after events, but a valuation of an asset de praesenti upon an uncertain future to be judged with regard to its soundness as an estimate upon the then facts and probabilities. It is not overthrown as an estimate in 1923 and 1924 by coming to the conclusion, as the General Commissioners have done, that in 1930 it had not been proved that the debts were to any extent bad. Supposing, however, instead of making an irrelevant pronouncement, the General Commissioners had addressed themselves to the true points—namely, the criticism of the estimate as in 1923 and 1924—what material had they before them to justify, first, the intervention at all of the inspector on the ground of a 'discovery,' and, secondly, their own action in upholding the additional assessment made in pursuance of that intervention? The only way, I think, in which it could be put would be that the subsequent growth of the indebtedness indicated that there must have been some fact in 1923 and 1924 which (a) was not taken into account in the estimate, and (b) would have made the estimate as an estimate in 1922 and 1923 higher. It may indicate that the appellants in 1923 and 1924 were willing to contemplate that the debt should or might increase, but I think it is merely guesswork in the circumstances of this case to infer that that was because there was then reason to think the existing debt good."

It seems to me the learned judge was there holding that the fact that the company in subsequent years had given further credit to those debtors was irrelevant in ascertaining whether or not the debt was a bad debt several years earlier. When one examines the case carefully, one sees that is the real foundation of his judgment, but it is true that in giving that judgment ROWLATT, J., did use language which, if applied literally to the facts of the present case, would, I think, be sufficient for counsel for the taxpayers. He said (ibid., 281):

"The real question is whether, within the meaning of s. 125, the inspector has 'discovered' an undercharge in the first assessment. The word 'discover' does not, in my view, include a mere change of opinion on the same facts and figures upon the same question of accountancy, being a question of opinion."

He then goes on to refer to R. v. Kensington Income Tax Commissioners (1) which, as I have already said, appears to me to lend very little, if any, assistance to the solution of this problem.

A somewhat similar matter arose for decision before FINLAY, J., in Williams v. Grundy's Trustees (3). There the trustees under a will, in making a return to income tax of the trust income, stated in error but in good faith that by reason of the provisions of the will, which they misread, the income was not liable to income tax. After production of the will and discussion with them the inspector of taxes agreed, and no assessment was made. His successor discovered the error and additional assessments were made on the trustees. The error which had been made was this. Under the will the income in question was held in trust for one Appleton, who was a domiciled American, until he attained the age of twenty-one years. The error which treated the interest under the will as a vested interest, and, therefore, exempt from tax, was, it was conceded, a bona fide error. That was clearly a mistake of law. FINLAY, J., had occasion to refer to ROWLATT, J.'s, decision in the Anderton case. He was not able to accept in its entirety the language used by ROWLATT, J., to which I have referred. He said ([1934] 1 K.B. 533):

"I have, however, come to the conclusion upon a survey of the authorities as a whole—and one must look at them as a whole—that it must not be supposed that ROWLATT, J. there was speaking otherwise than with reference to the facts of the particular case which was before him. Clearly one would think there could be no doubt as to the correctness of the result of that case, but I do not find it possible to apply the words I have quoted to every case in the sense of reading them as meaning that an inspector can never make a discovery if the making of that discovery involves only a change of opinion. I cannot think that that was what was meant and it does not seem to me that that view is consistent with the authorities to which I have already referred . . . I have carefully considered the authorities, but, apart from the authorities, if one looks at s. 125 itself, it is rather difficult to say that on the facts of this case the surveyor had not discovered, found out, that there were properties or profits chargeable to tax which had been omitted from the first assessments. He did, I think, find out that fact. The fact is, of course, that the properties or profits were chargeable to tax; they had been omitted from the first assessments and he found that out. The only answer made to this is that they had been omitted from the first assessment, so to speak, with the sanction of the inspector, because he, like those making the return, supposed that they were not properties or profits chargeable to tax. But of course an inspector would have no power to sanction such an omission. He discovers, he finds out, that they are chargeable, and I have difficulty in seeing why s. 125 does not then precisely apply."

I should have pointed out that the income in question was derived from foreign possessions. That is the property which had been omitted, to which FINLAY, J., was referring.

The next case is one which came before this court, British Sugar Manufacturers, Ltd. v. Harris (4). That was an appeal from a decision of FINLAY, J. He had followed his own decision in Williams v. Grundy Trustees (3), and the question involved was whether a certain sum of money that had been expended was properly deductible in arriving at the profits of the company or whether it was merely a distribution of the company's profits. In that case the inspector, who had previously taken the view on the same facts that the sum in question was properly deductible, now took the view that it was merely a distribution of profits, and he caused additional assessments to be made. On the hearing of the appeal the first question that arose was whether the inspector's second thoughts were correct, and the court held that they were not. The court came to the conclusion that the inspector's first view was the correct one, and, accordingly, the contention on behalf of the Crown failed, but the Attorney-General, in the course of his argument, had urged the second point which would have arisen if the court had held that the inspector's second thoughts were right, namely, that he had made a "discovery" within the meaning of s. 125 which would have justified the additional assessments. Having heard the whole of the argument for the Crown the court did not call on counsel for the company to reply, and when SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R. had given his judgment on the main point he was proceeding to deal with the second point, which would have arisen if they had taken a different view on the first point, when the learned Attorney-General intervened and indicated that, if the judgment of the court was adverse to the Crown on that point, the Crown would be compelled to ask for leave to appeal to the House of Lords. Accordingly, counsel for the taxpayer consenting, the court left the matter where it was and delivered no judgment on that point, although from the observations of ROMER, L.J., that the decision of the court would have been adverse to the Crown.

Finally, we get to a case in the Court of Session—Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Mackinlay's Trustees (5), on July 6, 1938, six or seven months after the British Sugar Manufacturers' case (4) had been before this court, where a very similar point arose. There had been a deed of partnership between certain persons, one of whom was a Colonel Mackinlay who had died. A question arose with regard to the tax payable by his trustees in respect of his share of the profits for the year of his death. There was a provision in cl. 15 of the partnership deed which provided that, in the event of the death, bankruptcy or expulsion of any of the partners, "the price to be paid for the share of such deceasing or outgoing partner or partners shall be the amount standing at his credit in the immediately preceding balance sheet but under deduction of any sums drawn out by him and with the addition of any sums paid in by him since the date of that balance sheet with progressive interest at 5 per cent. per annum from the date of the balance sheet to the date when the partner's interest shall cease, and a sum in lieu of profits for the same period calculated upon the assumption that the profits shall be the same as the average for the corresponding period during the immediately preceding three years and a proportion taken which is applicable to the said partner's share for the period that has run since the date of the said last balance sheet." On Nov. 19, 1935, the Special Commissioners wrote to the trustees' solicitors stating that, in the opinion of the assessing commissioners, the deceased was not entitled to any share of the firm's profits for the year ending Apr. 5, 1935, and that the capital sum which became payable under the partnership agreement to his representatives did not form part of his total income assessable to sur-tax for that year. An assessment to sur-tax was thereupon made on the trustees on the basis set out in the Special Commissioners' letter. Then, as the LORD PRESIDENT (LORD NORMAND), in giving his opinion, stated (1938, S.C. 770) :

"Nothing more took place between the trustees and the Special Commissioners until December, 1937, when the Special Commissioners again wrote to the trustees' solicitors stating that it was proposed to include in the computation of the deceased's total income for sur-tax purposes for the year to Apr. 5, 1935, the sum of £7,479 representing his share of income from the partnership. This amount was computed by reference to the provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 20, and is really based on the 35/60ths of the profits of the firm to which Colonel Mackinlay was entitled during the years actually preceding the year of his death."

So the discovery there made was that what had got to be considered was not cl. 15 of the partnership deed, but the effect of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 20, as applied to the other provisions of the deed, which set out the share of the profits which Colonel Mackinlay would have received. In dealing with that matter LORD NORMAND said (1938, S.C. 771) :

"Accordingly, it remains to consider whether in this case the commissioners are entitled to say that such a discovery has been made. In considering that question we have, of course, to assume pro veritate that the first assessment to sur-tax laid upon the trustees was mistaken, and that the additional assessment now laid on will be a correct assessment. The question therefore is whether a discovery that a mistake, essentially a mistake of law, has been made is a discovery within the meaning of s. 125. I think the word 'discover' in itself, according to the ordinary use of language, may be taken simply to mean 'find out.' What has to be found or found out is that any properties or profits chargeable to tax have been omitted from the first assessment. Now, it is clear that what has happened here is within the literal meaning of these words. If the additional assessment is a correct assessment, then it is plain that certain profits chargeable to tax have been omitted. I go on to the next paragraph of s. 125 (1), which is an alternative to the first paragraph. There the discovery which must be made is stated in alternative forms of which the first is that a person chargeable has not delivered any statement or has not delivered a full and proper statement. There is an express finding in the case that a full and proper statement has been made. But then we have to go on and give effect to the alternative which follows : 'Or has not been assessed to tax, or has been undercharged.' I think that, since these words must apply where the person chargeable has delivered a full and proper statement, they are apt to cover the case of a discovery of a mistake in the assessment caused by a mistake in the construction of the partnership deed or, it may be, caused by a mistake in the law applicable to such a deed, even where there has been a complete disclosure of all relevant facts upon which a correct assessment might have been based. I do not think it is stretching the word 'discovers' to hold that it covers the finding out that an error in law has been committed in the first assessment, when it is desired to correct that by an additional assessment."

Later he says :

"That again seems to me rather to point to the discovery that a deduction claimed upon a true representation of the facts has been allowed, although it is contrary to those provisions in the Act which authorise deductions to be made. That is to say that again that third paragraph appears to be intended to apply to the discovery of an error in law just as much as to an error in fact. Of course, if there were any reason in the context for restricting the word 'discover' to the discovery of an error in fact, that restriction would necessarily receive effect, but, in my opinion, the context points, not to any such restriction, but on the contrary to so wide a meaning that the word ought to be held to cover just the kind of discovery which was made here, when the Special Commissioners found out that, by reason of a misapprehension of the legal position, certain of the profits chargeable to tax had been omitted from the first assessment."

It is true that that opinion is not binding on this court, and that the Court of Appeal in 1938, in the British Sugar Manufacturers' case (4), had not got the benefit of reading that opinion of LORD NORMAND. All I can say, with respect, is that what is there stated by LORD NORMAND appears to me completely to fit the present case, and I can do no more than say that the way he puts it convinces me that the argument of the Crown is the one which should be accepted by us. I can do no more than adopt the language of LORD NORMAND, and will not attempt to say the same thing in poorer language. Although he may not have been dealing with a mistake in the general law of the country as distinct from a mistake in the interpretation of a document, the case was rather on the border line. He was dealing with the proper application of the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 20, to the provisions of the particular deed, but I think his language is applicable here and the reasoning is equally applicable to mistakes made with regard to the discovery of the effect of the general law on a particular set of facts. It is true that the result of this construction of s. 125 may of necessity in some cases involve the taxpayer in the hardship that assessments made some years previously may be affected or upset by additional assessments made in the light of, perhaps, some subsequent decision of the House of Lords, but, none the less, I think that this is the proper construction of the section. In my view, any other construction of the word "discoverer" might not be welcome to taxpayers when the provisions of s. 140 come to be considered, where the legislature is dealing with discoveries made by the taxpayer. However that may be, I base my decision on what I think is the clear language of s. 125 as construed by LORD NORMAND in the opinion to which I have referred, and for those reasons I think this appeal fails.

COHEN, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The learned judge, ATKINSON, J., based his judgment on the decision of FINLAY, J., in the Grundy case (3) and the Court of Session in the Mackinlay case (5). These cases are clear authorities for the conclusion which he reached, and had it not been for the Anderton case (2) and the British Sugar Manufacturers' case (4) to which TUCKER, L.J., has referred, I should have been content without more to adopt the reasoning of LORD NORMAND in the Mackinlay case (5). There are, however, observations in the Anderton case (2) and the British Sugar Manufacturers' case (4) which support the opposite view. The Anderton case (2) on any view, as FINLAY, J., pointed out in the Grundy case (3), was clearly rightly decided. The real decision in the Anderton case (2) was that there was no evidence that the deductions then in question were wrongly allowed by reference to the circumstances at the time of allowance, and for that reason the additional assessments were not justified. True it is, that ROWLATT, J., went on to say ([1932] 1 K.B. 281), in the passage to which my Lord has referred: "The word 'discover' does not, in my view, include a mere change of opinion on the same facts and figures upon the same question of accountancy, being a question of opinion." It is also clear that the Court of Appeal were inclined, in the British Sugar Manufacturers' case (4), to the same view, but TUCKER, L.J., has pointed out that the Court of Appeal gave no decision, and we are compelled to come to our own conclusion on the question of law unassisted by any decision on the point. I am convinced that the reasoning of LORD NORMAND in the Mackinlay case (5) was sound and, like TUCKER, L.J., I desire to adopt it as my reasons for the conclusion that ATKINSON, J.'s, decision was right.

I desire to add only one more word. If some other meaning is to be given to "discover" than the natural meaning "to find out," I should like to learn what it is. Counsel for the taxpayers had great difficulty in reaching a definition, but, finally, in his reply, he said: "If the surveyor discovers" means "If the surveyor sees any fact or circumstance which was not apparent when the first assessment was made and which shows or tends to show . . ." That is rather an elaborate translation, and, indeed, if that be the meaning of the draftsman, he has adopted a most unusual compendious phrase. But the matter did not stop there because that was not sufficient definition for counsel. He said, "I should have to add a definition that the provisions of an Act of Parliament are not a fact or circumstance which can be discovered." I think the fallacy of counsel's argument is exposed by the paraphrase he found himself compelled to suggest to attain the result he desired. I think, therefore, that is an additional reason for accepting the construction which LORD NORMAND has placed on the word.

There is one other matter to which I ought to refer. At one stage in his argument counsel for the taxpayers suggested that some meaning ought to be given to the word "undercharged" in the section other than its natural meaning. That point does not seem to have been taken either before the commissioners or before the learned judge, but, assuming it to be open to him, in my opinion, it has no foundation. The meaning which counsel invited us to adopt was that there should be read into the words "by accident or error, not being an error in the general law." I see no reason for reading in something which narrows the natural meaning of the expression. It seems to me that, if we were to accept this argument, we should not be fulfilling our duty of construing the language used. We should be guessing at the intention of Parliament, and in all probability guessing wrongly. For those reasons, and for the reasons given by my Lord, I am of the opinion that ATKINSON, J., was quite right in the conclusion to which he came; and the appeal fails.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I concur.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: R. C. Bartlett & Co. (for the taxpayers); Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Inspector of Taxes).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

BARBER v. ROWE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker and Cohen, L.JJ., and Birkett, J.), October 29, November 3, 1948.]

Evidence—Secondary evidence—Contents of document—Lost document—Note or memorandum of agreement—Lease—Admission of counterpart on proof of loss of lease—Law of Property Act, 1925 (c. 20), s. 40.

By an agreement in writing, dated Aug. 10, 1936, E.B. let certain offices to the defendant for a term of ten years from Aug. 3, 1936, at a yearly rent of £52 per annum. On Aug. 5, 1945, E.B. died leaving the plaintiff as sole beneficiary. On Aug. 3, 1946, the plaintiff gave the defendant notice to quit the premises, but the defendant claimed that he was entitled to a renewal of his lease under a lease alleged to have been executed by E.B. on Mar. 31, 1938. The only written evidence of this document was the counterpart of the lease held by the defendant and bearing his signature, but not signed by E.B. At the hearing the defendant testified that he and E.B. had together gone to a solicitor, when the lease and counterpart had been signed, and this evidence was corroborated by the solicitor. The plaintiff contended that there was no evidence that the alleged lease of Mar. 31, 1938, had been executed by E.B., and, alternatively, that there was no note or memorandum in writing of the covenant to grant a further lease sufficient to satisfy s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

HELD: (i) satisfactory proof of the loss of the lease having been given, secondary evidence as to its contents in the form of the counterpart was admissible.

(ii) the contents of the lease having been thus proved, the lease constituted a sufficient note or memorandum under s. 40.

Dictum of LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in Read v. Price ([1909] 2 K.B. 730; 101 L.T. 62), applied.

[AS TO ADMISSION OF DRAFTS AND COUNTERPARTS AS SECONDARY EVIDENCE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 13, pp. 532, para. 597; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 22, pp. 234-235, Nos. 2089-2095.]

Case referred to:

(1) Read v. Price, [1909] 2 K.B. 724; 78 L.J.K.B. 1137; 101 L.T. 60; 12 Digest 39, 190.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from a decision of His Honour JUDGE FORBES, dated Apr. 29, 1948, given at Birmingham County Court, rejecting the plaintiff's claim to possession of certain premises and decreeing specific performance of an agreement to renew the lease. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal. The facts appear in the judgment of COHEN, L.J.

R. K. Brown for the plaintiff.

J. H. Moss for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3. COHEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from a decision of His Honour JUDGE FORBES given at the Birmingham County Court by which he rejected the plaintiff's claim for possession and on the defendant's counterclaim decreed specific performance of an agreement to renew the lease of the premises, which consisted of offices, workshops and store-rooms at the rear of 25 and 27, Sutton Road, Erdington, in the county borough of Birmingham. The plaintiff was the widow of one Eli Barber and deposed in her evidence that she managed her husband's affairs. He died on Aug. 5, 1945, and she (his widow) was the sole beneficiary. The defendant first became interested in the premises in August, 1936. By an agreement in writing dated Aug. 10, 1936, Eli Barber let the premises to the

A defendant for a term of ten years from Aug. 3, 1936, at the yearly rent of £52 per annum. That term expired in August, 1946, and on Aug. 3, 1946, the plaintiff gave the defendant notice to quit the premises. The defendant, however, refused to do so, alleging that he was entitled to a renewal of his lease under a lease alleged to have been executed on Mar. 31, 1938, for a term expiring on Aug. 3, 1946. The only evidence in writing of this document was the counterpart, which was signed by the defendant, but not signed by the late Eli Barber, and which was produced from the custody of the defendant. The defendant, however, deposed in evidence that he and the late Eli Barber had gone together to a solicitor, Mr. C. H. Wareing, and that on the occasion of their visit to him the late Eli Barber and the defendant signed respectively the lease and counterpart of the lease. The solicitor in question, Mr. C. H. Wareing, was also called by the defendant. The learned judge's notes only show that Mr. Wareing said that he knew Eli Barber before 1920, but counsel who appeared for the defendant both in this court and the court below said that Mr. Wareing said a great deal more, and, indeed, corroborated the defendant's evidence that the late Eli Barber and the defendant signed respectively the lease and counterpart of the lease in his (Mr. Wareing's) office. On this evidence the learned judge found that the lease referred to in the counterclaim was duly executed by Eli Barber as lessor, and, as it had been lost, he admitted the counterpart as evidence of its contents. He found that the option contained in the lease had been duly exercised and decreed specific performance of the covenant to grant a further lease. The plaintiff, by her defence to counterclaim, had taken the objection that there was no memorandum in writing of the covenant to grant a further lease sufficient to satisfy the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 40, but the learned judge held that the lost lease was a sufficient memorandum.

D From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, and counsel on her behalf has submitted that there was no evidence on which the learned judge could hold that the lease in question was signed, sealed, and delivered by the late Eli Barber. Alternatively, he submitted that the learned judge was wrong in law in holding that there was a note or memorandum sufficient to satisfy s. 40. E In our opinion, the first argument cannot be sustained. If the evidence of the defendant and Mr. Wareing was admissible, it clearly established that the lease had been signed by the late Eli Barber. In our opinion, the second argument also fails. Counsel for the plaintiff suggested that, if evidence of this kind could be admitted and the document thus proved be held to satisfy F s. 40, it would be easy for a plaintiff to escape the provisions of that section by going into the box and swearing that the other party to the document had executed it and that it was now lost. This argument may be a reason why the court should approach with care evidence directed to establishing in this way a memorandum sufficient to satisfy s. 40, but we see no reason in theory why the general rule as to secondary evidence should not apply. Indeed, G there is clear authority that it does apply: see Read v. Price (1). In that case the document in question was an acknowledgment to take the case out of the Statute of Limitations, and the relevant section was s. 5 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, but LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., made some observations of general import where he said ([1909] 2 K.B. 730):

H "You may prove the existence of the writing by the ordinary law of evidence, and when the writing is lost, and the proof of the loss is satisfactory to the court, you may give secondary evidence of the contents of the lost document, just as in cases where writing is required under the Statute of Frauds you can always prove the existence of the writing by parol evidence, if proof is given of the loss of the written document."

Indeed, were it otherwise s. 40 might be made an instrument of fraud, for a party desirous of escaping from his obligation under a contract might destroy the written evidence of that contract, thus making it impossible for the opposite party to prove the contract.

In the present case the learned judge found as a fact that the lease had been executed, that it had been lost, and he accepted the counterpart as secondary evidence of its contents. There seems to us to be ample evidence on which he could so find, and in these circumstances it is impossible for us to interfere with the order he has made. In our opinion, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Sweepstones, agents for Margetts & Ritchie, Birmingham (for the plaintiff); G. Martin & Co., agents for Charles H. Wareing, Birmingham (for the defendant).

[Reported by C. St.J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re ITTER (deceased). DEDMAN AND OTHERS v. GODFREY AND ANOTHER.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), November 10, 1948.]

Will—Alteration—Evidence of original contents—Dependent relative revocation—Infra-red photography to reveal words hidden by slips of paper—Words “apparent” before the alteration—Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 21.

By a codicil, dated Feb. 22, 1944, to a will, dated Nov. 5, 1942, the testator, who died on Apr. 6, 1946, purported to give certain legacies to the plaintiffs. The amounts of these legacies were written on strips of paper pasted over words and figures appearing in the original document, but the alteration was not executed as a will in accordance with the Wills Act, 1837, s. 21. Letters of administration were granted to the defendants with the amounts of the legacies left blank. The plaintiffs contended that there had been no effective revocation of the original bequests and applied for leave to subject the original codicil to infra-red photography or other similar process, or, alternatively, that an expert be appointed to examine and report on the codicil.

HELD: (i) the doctrine of dependent relative revocation applied, the use of a photographic process to ascertain the state of the document in its original form was permissible, and an expert would be appointed by the court for that purpose.

(ii) even if the doctrine did not apply, if the original words could be read by means of this process, they would be “apparent” within the meaning of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 21, so as to prevent effect being given to any alteration which was not itself executed as a will.

[AS TO DEPENDENT RELATIVE REVOCATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 34, pp. 89, 90, para. 127; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 44, pp. 361-365, Nos. 1944-1978.]

Case referred to:

- (1) In the Goods of Horsford, (1874), L.R. 3 P. & D. 211; 44 L.J.P. & M. 9; 31 L.T. 553; 44 Digest 307, 1381.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether an order should be made permitting the use of infra-red photography or other similar process to ascertain certain passages in a hand-written codicil to a will which were concealed by slips of paper with writing on them pasted over those passages, or, alternatively, applying for the appointment of an expert to examine and report on the will.

The plaintiffs were legatees under a codicil, dated Feb. 22, 1944, to the will of the testatrix. This codicil, which was in the handwriting of the testatrix

A and purported to give substantial legacies to the plaintiffs, had slips of paper with writing on them pasted over other writing in each of the clauses purporting to bequeath the legacies. The attesting witnesses were unable to say whether the slips were on the document at the time of its execution. Letters of administration with the codicil annexed were granted to the defendants with blanks referring to the matter covered by the slips. The plaintiffs claimed revocation of the letters of administration, and, since the words could be made visible, the granting of the letters of administration with the inclusion of the original writing. Expert evidence was given of the methods which could be adopted for photographing the document with the object of ascertaining the words beneath the slips of paper pasted over them, and it was stated that no physical damage to, or interference with, the document would be involved. ORMEROD, J., B held, reversing the decision of the registrar, that the plaintiffs were entitled to have the document photographed by infra-red or other process and directed that an expert be appointed for that purpose.

Sophian for the plaintiffs.

R. T. Barnard for the defendants (administrators of the estate).

C ORMEROD, J. : I think that an order should be made on this summons. It is, so far as I know, the first time that an application has been made for the consent of the court to the use of this modern scientific process to photograph a will to ascertain the truth which lies behind a piece of paper. If the truth can be obtained by this method the fact that it has not been done before is no reason why it should not be done now, or in the future.

D The argument on behalf of the plaintiffs is put in two ways. First, it is said that it is a case of dependent relative revocation, and, therefore, any method may be used to ascertain the state of the document as it was originally drawn. In In the Goods of Horsford (1), it was held that in such circumstances the piece of paper may be removed to discover what was written underneath, but here the plaintiffs are not asking for any physical interference with the will. They E ask for the will to be photographed by a process which may enable the court to know what is under those slips of paper without any interference with the document itself. This appears to be a case where the doctrine of dependent relative revocation applies and I am satisfied that an order should be made.

F Secondly, the plaintiffs say that, even if this were not a case where the doctrine applies, an order should still be made on the ground that, if the words can be read by means of this photographic process, they are "apparent" within the meaning of s. 21 of the Wills Act, 1837. In the circumstances it is not necessary for me to decide this point, but I think it is not stretching the language of the Act too far to say that if by the use of this photographic process the words can be seen and ascertained then they are "apparent" within the meaning of the section. If, therefore, this had not been a case of dependent relative G revocation I should still have made an order on this summons. In these circumstances there will be an order for a court expert to be appointed to report on the codicil.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors : Mount, Sterry & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Kingsford, Dorman & Co. (for the defendants).

[Reported by R. HENDRY WHITE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WEBB v. JACKSON WYNESS, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 24, 1948.]

Food and Drugs—Food not of nature, substance or quality demanded—Standard of quality—No standard prescribed by law—Standard to be fixed in accordance with evidence—Vinegar—Deficiency in acetic acid content—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 3 (1).

The respondents were charged under s. 83 (1) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, with being responsible for the commission of an offence under s. 3 (1) of the Act, namely, selling to the prejudice of the purchaser non-brewed vinegar not of the quality demanded. The vinegar contained acetic acid to a less extent than 4 per cent. No standard of the amount of acetic acid which non-brewed vinegar should contain is prescribed by law, but it was found by the justices that public analysts, the Non-Brewed Vinegar Manufacturers' Association, and the Ministry of Food regarded 4 per cent. as the minimum amount of acetic acid which non-brewed vinegar should contain. The defence was that the respondents manufactured over 20,000 bottles a month, which they had sold to the public without any complaint. The justices dismissed the information on the ground that the prosecutor had not fully discharged the burden of proving that the vinegar was not of the quality demanded by an ordinary purchaser.

HELD: where there was no standard of quality prescribed by law, a standard must be fixed in accordance with the evidence before the court; the question for the justices was whether the vinegar sold to the public was deficient in respect of the acetic acid it contained by reference to the standard which, according to the evidence, genuine vinegar ought to contain; the fact that purchasers did not complain, and probably did not know what percentage of acetic acid the vinegar should contain was immaterial; and, therefore, the offence was proved.

[AS TO STANDARD OF QUALITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 15, p. 155, para. 248; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, pp. 88, 89, Nos. 146-155.]

FOR THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1938, ss. 3 and 83, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 31, pp. 254 and 305.]

CASE STATED by Kensington justices.

The respondents were charged, under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (1), with being responsible for the commission of an offence under s. 3 (1) of the Act, namely, selling to the prejudice of the purchaser non-brewed vinegar not of the nature, substance or quality demanded. The justices dismissed the information on the ground that the prosecutor had not fully discharged the burden of proving that the vinegar was not of the quality demanded by an ordinary purchaser. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal from the justices' decision. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

Neve, K.C., and R. A. Robinson for the appellant (the prosecutor).

F. M. Landau for the respondents.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the justices of the Kensington Division, before whom the respondents were charged, under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (1), with selling an article of food, to wit, non-brewed vinegar, to the prejudice of the purchaser, contrary to s. 3 (1) of the Act, and it was proved beyond doubt that the vinegar contained acetic acid to a less extent than 4 per cent. It was intimated to the justices, when the case first came before them, that there would be a challenge on the question whether non-brewed vinegar should contain any particular amount of acetic acid, and, accordingly, the case was adjourned. Later, the public analyst was called and several other witnesses of great weight and standing, and it appears from the facts set out by the justices that all public analysts, the Non-Brewed Vinegar Manufacturers' Association, and others, including the Ministry of Food, regard 4 per cent. as the minimum amount of acetic acid that non-brewed vinegar should contain.

The only evidence called for the defence was that the respondents have manufactured between 20,000 and 21,000 bottles a month of this vinegar, it has been sold to the public, and there has been no complaint. That means that the respondents have been selling vinegar which, apparently, nearly all reputable brewers and manufacturers of such vinegar regard as not containing the proper amount of acetic acid. An ordinary purchaser, however, would not know that. He would only know that the stuff had the taste of vinegar on the tongue, and, possibly, its reaction on a steel implement. The justices were evidently troubled in this case and gave as their opinion :

"We were of opinion that the appellant had not fully discharged the burden of proving that the sample in question was not of the nature, substance or quality which is to be deemed to be demanded by an ordinary purchaser of non-brewed vinegar and, therefore, dismissed the information."

With all respect to the justices, I think that their decision was wrong. The question to which they should have applied their minds was : Is there a standard of quality prescribed by law, and, if there is not a standard prescribed by law, what is the standard which, on the evidence, we must prescribe ? The justices simply say that they do not find any standard. On the evidence, I think the only decision to which they could have come, if they had applied their minds to that point, was that the vinegar must contain 4 per cent. of acetic acid. It is no answer to say that the ordinary person buying this description of vinegar does not know how much acetic acid it ought to contain, and, therefore, is satisfied with anything. There must be some standard, and that standard must be fixed in accordance with the evidence which the justices have before them. The evidence in this case is overwhelming that there is a standard recognised by reputable manufacturers, by public analysts and by the Ministry of Food. The justices, therefore, ought not to have considered merely whether people who buy the vinegar complain, or whether the people who buy the vinegar know what is the proper percentage of acetic acid the vinegar should contain. They ought to have considered whether this vinegar, which has been sold to the public, is deficient in some respect, i.e., in respect of the acetic acid which it contains, as regards the standard which genuine vinegar ought to contain ? For these reasons, I think this Case must go back to the justices, with an intimation that an offence was proved.

HILBERY, J. : I agree.

BIRKETT, J. : I also agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors : J. Waring Sainsbury, town clerk, Kensington (for the appellant) ; Philip L. Ross (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

GAMMACK v. JACKSON WYNESS, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 24, 1948.]

Food and Drugs—Analyst's certificate—Analysis of sample—Form of certificate—Need of standard for comparison—Food and Drugs Act, 1938 (c. 56), s. 81 (1).

The respondents were charged under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (3), that it was due to their act or default that a certain company had sold to the prejudice of the purchaser non-brewed vinegar which was not of the quality demanded, contrary to s. 3 (1) of the Act. The only evidence that the vinegar was not of the quality demanded was a public analyst's certificate, which was on the prescribed form but merely stated: " . . . as a result of my analysis, I am of opinion that the constituents of the sample included the following substances in proportions as under: acetic acid 3.54 per cent. I am of the opinion that this sample is 11.5 per cent. deficient in acetic acid."

HELD: as the analyst's certificate did not show any standard by reference to which a deficiency in acetic acid content could be measured, the magistrate was not bound to accept the certificate as evidence that the vinegar was not of the quality demanded.

Per curiam: Where an analyst's certificate is to be put in as evidence, the analyst should state enough to enable, not only the court, but also the defendant, to see exactly what is the offence with which the defendant is charged.

Dictum of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., in Bayley v. Cook, (1905) (92 L.T. 171), applied.

[AS TO STANDARD OF QUALITY, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 15, p. 155, para. 248; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, pp. 88, 89, Nos. 146-154.]

FOR THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT, 1938, ss. 3 (1) and 83 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 31, pp. 254 and 306.]

Case referred to:

(1) Bayley v. Cook, (1905), 92 L.T. 170; 69 J.P. 139; 25 Digest 77, 67.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at West London, an information was preferred by the appellant, a sampling officer of the metropolitan borough of Fulham, against the respondents under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (3). The charge was that, by reason of the act or default of the respondents, a company, Wills & Sons, Ltd., unlawfully sold to the prejudice of the purchaser an article of food, namely, non-brewed vinegar, which was not of the quality of the article demanded, contrary to s. 3 (1) of the Act. The sample of vinegar sold by the company bore a label "Non-brewed vinegar, manufactured by Jackson Wyness, Ltd." (the respondents), and it was sold in the condition in which it was supplied with a written warranty by the respondents. The public analyst certified that the sample included 3.54 per cent of acetic acid, and that, in his opinion, it was 11.5 per cent. deficient in acetic acid. After being served with the summons, the respondents informed the appellant that they did not require the attendance of the public analyst at the hearing, and no other evidence of the deficiency was offered. At the close of the appellant's case the respondents contended that there was no case to answer as there was no evidence to prove the percentage of acetic acid which non-brewed vinegar ought to contain and no standard for non-brewed vinegar was set up by statute or regulation. The appellant contended that, in the absence of contrary evidence, the certificate of the public analyst was conclusive proof of the offence. The magistrate dismissed the information on the ground that there was no standard prescribed by law for the acetic acid content of non-brewed vinegar and that the analyst's certificate was too vague. The Divisional Court now dismissed an appeal from that decision.

R. A. Robinson for the appellant.

F. M. Landau for the respondents.

A

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate before whom the appellants were charged, under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, s. 83 (3), that it was due to their act or default that a company named Wills & Sons, Ltd., had sold to the prejudice of the purchaser a certain article of food, non-brewed vinegar, which was not of the quality demanded, contrary to s. 3 (1) of the Act. The only evidence that was put before the learned magistrate, other than the formal evidence of purchase and that the necessary steps had been taken under the Food and Drugs Act, 1938, (i.e., that a sample had been taken and submitted to the public analyst), was an analyst's certificate, which was in these words :

B

C

"I certify that I received on Mar. 5, 1943, from you a sample submitted as a sample of non-brewed vinegar for analysis, which was marked No. 178. I further certify that I have analysed it and, as a result of my analysis, I am of opinion that the constituents of the sample included the following substances in proportions as under : acetic acid 3.54 per cent. I am of the opinion that this sample is 11.5 per cent. deficient in acetic acid."

D

The magistrate said that, as there was no standard prescribed by law for the acetic acid content in non-brewed vinegar, the statement in the analyst's certificate was too vague to justify a conviction, and, therefore, he dismissed the summons. We are asked to say that, on that certificate, the magistrate was bound to convict.

E

Where an analyst's certificate is to be put in evidence the analyst should state enough to enable, not only the court, but also the defendant, to see exactly what is the offence—exactly why he is said to have sold an article to the prejudice of the purchaser. It was said, as long ago as 1905, by LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J. (92 L.T. 171), in Bayley v. Cook (1) :

"The certificate must show that the sample of milk has been compared with some standard."

F

Unless it can be shown what the standard is, one cannot say that an article is deficient. There must be a standard, some yard-stick, in order to show whether there is a deficiency. In the present case, speaking for myself and, I think, I may also speak for HILBERY, J., when I read the Case and the analysis, I came to the conclusion that something entirely different was being certified from what the explanation of counsel for the appellant had shown was being certified. If it misled us, it may very well have misled other people.

G

The magistrate was not satisfied because the certificate does not say with what standard the sample had been compared. The sample is said to contain 3.54 per cent. of acetic acid, and then the analyst observes that it is 11.5 per cent. deficient in acetic acid. By a process of mathematics, i.e., by starting with the 11.5 per cent. by which the sample is said to be deficient, and taking the 3.54 per cent. of acetic acid it contains, one can work out that the analyst is saying that 4 per cent. is the standard. I do not think that any court is called on to do these sums to enable it to decide whether or not a case is proved. If the analyst had certified that genuine non-brewed vinegar must contain 4 per cent. of acetic acid and no evidence had been called to controvert that, then a series of cases, to which our attention has been called but to which I need not refer, show that the analyst's opinion must be taken as conclusive, and the magistrate must have held that an offence had been committed. But I do not think we can say that the magistrate was bound to be satisfied on a certificate of this kind which can only be explained as containing a reference to a 4 per cent. standard if one makes calculations with decimal points and percentages. This court does not think it right in a criminal case to encourage analysts to give certificates like this which leave the matter in a vague and unsatisfactory way and can only be tested by doing these sums. Analysts should understand that their certificates should be in a form which an ordinary person, not an analyst and, perhaps, not a mathematician, can understand. These certificates may affect quite humble and unintelligent people, and it is right that they should know what it is suggested they have done wrong. In these circumstances, I think the magistrate was right in dismissing this information, and this appeal fails.

H

HILBERY, J. : I agree.

BIRKETT, J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Cyril F. Thatcher, Town Clerk, Fulham (for the appellant); Philip L. Ross & Co. (for the respondents).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BECK v. BINKS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 25, 1948.]

Customs—Carrying uncustomed goods with intent to defraud—Possession away from port of entry—Evasion of purchase tax on imported goods and evasion of customs duty one offence—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (c. 36), s. 186—Finance Act, 1944 (c. 23), s. 11 (1).

The appellant was found in Stamford Hill, London, in possession of 208 Swiss watches on which duty had not been paid. He was convicted on two counts (i) of evading customs duty on them, contrary to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 186, and (ii) of evading purchase tax, contrary to s. 186 as applied by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 11 (1). He contended (a) that s. 186 of the Act of 1876 applied only where a person was found in possession of prohibited goods at a port of entry, and (b) that evasion of purchase tax should not have been dealt with in a separate charge.

HELD : (i) as the appellant had been found dealing with uncustomed goods with intent to defraud the Crown of duties, he was guilty of an offence against s. 186 of the Act of 1876, notwithstanding that he was found in possession of the goods inland and not at a port of entry or where the goods were landed.

(ii) by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 11 (1), purchase tax in regard to imported goods was to be regarded as customs duty, and, therefore, a person who was evading customs duty and purchase tax on the same goods was guilty of one offence only, and the conviction of the appellant of evading purchase tax was wrong.

[FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1944, s. 11 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 37, p. 536.]

CASE STATED by a metropolitan police magistrate.

The appellant was charged with (i) carrying uncustomed goods with intent to defraud the Crown of duties, contrary to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 186, and (ii) evading purchase tax on them, contrary to s. 186 as applied by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 11 (1). He was convicted of both offences, and sentenced to 6 months' imprisonment on each count, the sentences to run concurrently, and to a fine of £2,000 on each count. The Divisional Court now held that he had been rightly convicted on the first count, but that the offence of evading purchase tax on imported goods was included in the offence of evading customs duty, and, therefore, the conviction and sentence on the second count must be quashed. The facts appear in the judgment of LORD GODDARD, C.J.

A Serjeant Sullivan, K.C., and Baerlein for the appellant.
John Foster for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Special Case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate, before whom the appellant was charged with four offences, two of which were dismissed. The third charge was :

B “ Knowingly carrying uncustomed goods [208 watches] on Apr. 13, 1948, with intent to defraud His Majesty of the duties due thereon contrary to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 186.”

The fourth charge was :

C “ Knowingly carrying goods chargeable with purchase tax [208 watches] on Apr. 13, 1948, with intent to defraud His Majesty of the tax due thereon contrary to the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 186, as applied by the Finance Act, 1944, s. 11.”

D An officer of the customs who was keeping watch on the appellant found that he was carrying in a brief case 208 Swiss watches on which duty had not been paid. The appellant was arrested in Stamford Hill, London when he was in possession of these watches, and, apparently, trying to pass them to someone else. The magistrate has found that the appellant knew that the watches were uncustomed. In any case the onus would be on him to show that he did not know, because the onus is put on him by the statute [s. 259].

E Counsel for the appellant argued that the provisions of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, s. 186, apply only to goods which are being dealt with —i.e., carried or taken into possession—at the port of entry because it is at the port of entry where the duty has to be paid, but it seems to me that this point is too clear for argument. Section 186 makes it an offence for anyone knowingly to acquire possession of uncustomed goods or to

F “ . . . be in any way knowingly concerned in carrying, removing, depositing, concealing, or in any manner dealing with any such goods with intent to defraud Her Majesty of any duties due thereon . . . ”

If a person is knowingly carrying uncustomed goods and assisting, therefore, in the smuggling of the goods, he, as much as anyone else, has an intent to defraud His Majesty of any duties due thereon. It is all part of one operation, and in this case, when the appellant was found dealing with 208 watches which were uncustomed, it is beyond question that he was carrying goods with intent to defraud His Majesty of duties thereon. Otherwise, a most extraordinary lacuna is left in the Act because it would be said that anyone who was dealing with smuggled goods and carrying them inland would never be guilty of an offence because he had got away from the port of entry where the goods were actually landed. I do not think that has ever yet been held

H to be the law and I am certainly not prepared so to hold now. I think it is clear that the appellant was carrying uncustomed goods with intent to defraud His Majesty of the duties thereon.

The second point is that a separate charge was put on the appellant of evading the purchase tax. It is said that where goods which are imported bear not only customs duty but also purchase tax, a person who is dealing with any such goods on which duties have been evaded is committing two offences and not one. This point depends on the wording of the Finance Act, 1944, s. 11 (1), which relates to purchase tax, and it seems to me to put the matter beyond doubt. Section 11 (1) is :

"The Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, and enactments amending that Act and other enactments (including provisions of regulations or other instruments having statutory effect) relating to customs generally shall have effect, subject to the provisions of this section and with such exceptions and adaptations as may be prescribed, in relation to chargeable goods imported into the United Kingdom, whether liable to any duty of customs or not, as if all such goods were liable to duties of customs and as if those duties included tax chargeable by virtue of importation."

By "chargeable goods" is meant goods chargeable with purchase tax. Section 11 (1) seems to me to provide that with regard to imported goods purchase tax is to be regarded as a customs duty and is made part of the customs duties. It simply increases the customs duty. Therefore, if a man evades one charge, he, no doubt, evades the other. His crime is only one crime and not two. He is evading customs duty and he is evading the purchase tax, but, by the operation of s. 11 of the Act of 1944, the two are to be regarded as one thing—customs duty. The appellant has been convicted of evading customs duty, and, as that duty includes both the customs duty and the purchase tax, he cannot be convicted of two offences. He is guilty of one offence, and, therefore, the conviction and the sentence passed on the charge alleging the evasion of purchase tax must be quashed.

HILBERY, J.: I agree.

BIRKETT, J.: I also agree.

Appeal dismissed on first point, and allowed on second point. The respondent to pay half the appellant's taxed costs.

Solicitors: Alfred Kerstein & Co. (for the appellant); Solicitor for the Customs and Excise (for the Crown).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

PARRY v. ANGLESEY ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 25, 1948.]

Rating—Agricultural building—Shed used as garage—Car used partly for farm and partly for private purposes—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928 (c. 44), s. 2 (2)—Agricultural Rates Act, 1929 (c. 26), s. 1 (1).

By the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2), "agricultural buildings" are defined as "buildings . . . occupied together with agricultural land . . . and . . . used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon."

The ratepayer, a farmer, used a motor car partly for purposes connected with his farm and partly for private purposes, and he claimed that the building in which the car was garaged was an "agricultural building" within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1928, so as to be exempt from rates under the Agricultural Rates Act, 1929, s. 1 (1).

HELD: whether the use of the car as a private car was so slight that the doctrine de minimis applied was a matter of degree and a question of fact for the justices to decide, and they were justified in holding on the facts that a building which garaged a car used substantially for private domestic purposes was not used solely in connection with agricultural operations.

[AS TO "AGRICULTURAL BUILDINGS," see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 27, p. 379, para. 809.]

CASE STATED by Anglesey Quarter Sessions, pursuant to the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, s. 31 (5).

The ratepayer, a farmer, used a motor car for general purposes connected with his farm, and, so far as permitted by law, also for general domestic or recreational purposes. The car was kept in a shed on the farm, which was "agricultural land" within the meaning of the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2). Before Dec. 12, 1947, no assessment for rates had been made in respect of the shed, but on that date the Anglesey Assessment Committee confirmed a proposal made by the rating authority for the amendment of the valuation list by increasing the ratepayer's assessment, the increase being in respect of the shed. The ratepayer appealed to quarter sessions on the ground that the shed was an "agricultural building" within the meaning of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1928, but on Feb. 20, 1948, his appeal was dismissed by quarter sessions whose order the Divisional Court now affirmed.

Scott Henderson, K.C., and Blease for the ratepayer.

Simes, K.C., and W. L. Roots for the assessment committee.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Special Case stated by the county of Anglesey Quarter Sessions and raises a very short point. The ratepayer, who is a farmer, keeps a motor car, which he uses for a variety of purposes. He uses it for the purposes of his farm and to take his produce to market, and he also uses it for a variety of domestic and social purposes—to go to a place of worship on Sundays and to go to the cinema. As it is put in the Special Case, "so far as permitted by law"—I suppose that means so far as the allowance of petrol permits—he has used it for social and domestic purposes. Therefore, the car is not merely a farm waggon or implement, but partly that and partly a private car.

The Agricultural Rates Act, 1929, grants exemption from rates during the current half-year in the case of agricultural hereditaments to which the Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, applies. Section 2 (1) of the Act of 1928 defines "agricultural hereditament" as "any hereditament being agricultural land or agricultural buildings," and s. 2 (2) defines "agricultural buildings" as "... buildings ... occupied together with agricultural land or being or forming part of a market garden, and in either case used solely in connection with agricultural operations thereon."

The ratepayer claims that the building in which the car is kept is an "agricultural building" within the meaning of s. 2 (2).

The justices would seem to have come to the conclusion that the car is both a private car and a farmer's car. It was for them to decide as a question of fact whether the use as a private car was so slight and so occasional that the doctrine of de minimis might fairly be applied. It is a matter of degree. It seems to me clear, on the facts which they have found, that the justices have applied their minds to the right point and have come to the conclusion that they cannot say that a building which garages a car which is used substantially for private domestic purposes and not merely for agricultural purposes can be regarded as a building used solely in connection with agricultural operations. Therefore, I think the question was essentially one of fact for the justices, and we cannot disturb their finding.

HILBERY, J.: I agree.

BIRKETT, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Ellis & Fairbairn (for the ratepayer); Whitfield, Byrne & Dean, agents for R. Gordon Roberts & Co., Llangefni (for the assessment committee).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

LYONS v. MAY.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 24, 1948.]

Road Traffic—Insurance against third party risks—Permitting vehicle to be used on road without policy of insurance being in force—Owner's policy covering only owner and persons in his employ—Lorry driven back to owner's premises by garage proprietor—Garage proprietor not in owner's employ—Garage proprietor not insured—Disqualification—"Special reasons"—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1) (2).

At the request of the owner, a garage proprietor drove a motor lorry, which he had been repairing, back to the owner's premises. The garage proprietor had no policy of insurance in force which covered the lorry, and the lorry owner's policy covered only himself and any authorised person in his employment. The lorry owner had not inquired whether the garage proprietor had a policy which would cover his driving of the lorry.

HELD : (i) a person who is ignorant of the fact that there is no policy of insurance covering a vehicle may be guilty of an offence if he permits the use of the vehicle while uninsured ; the garage proprietor was not a person in the lorry owner's employment while driving the lorry to the owner's premises ; and, therefore, the insurance did not cover the lorry at the time and the lorry owner was guilty of the offence of permitting the lorry to be used on the highway without a policy of insurance against third party risks being in force in respect of it, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1).

(ii) as the lorry owner's request to drive the car to his premises was made to a garage proprietor, who, according to the ordinary commercial experience of people, would usually be covered by a policy of insurance because of his trade requirements, there were special reasons for not disqualifying the lorry owner from holding a licence under s. 35 (2) of the Act.

Rennison v. Knowler ([1947] 1 All E.R. 302 ; sub nom. Knowler v. Rennison ([1947] K.B. 488 ; 176 L.T. 271), distinguished.

[FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 35, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 23, p. 636.]

Case referred to :

- (1) Rennison v. Knowler, [1947] 1 All E.R. 302 ; [1947] L.J.R. 555 ; 111 J.P. 171 ; sub nom. Knowler v. Rennison, [1947] K.B. 488 ; 176 L.T. 271 ; 2nd Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Glamorgan justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Bridgend the respondent was charged with having permitted a motor lorry to be used on a road in Glamorgan without a policy of insurance in respect of third party risks being in force, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1). The only policy of insurance applicable to the lorry covered the respondent and any duly authorised person in his employ. At the respondent's request, the lorry was driven to his premises by a garage proprietor who had been requested by the respondent to repair it. The justices held that no offence had been committed because the garage proprietor had been employed by the respondent to drive the car to the respondent's premises. The Divisional Court now allowed the appeal from the justices' order.

Featherstone for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by justices for the county of Glamorgan in which the respondent was charged with permitting a certain motor lorry to be used on a highway without a policy of insurance against third party risks being in force in respect of it, contrary to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1). The respondent sent his lorry to a garage to be repaired, and, on finding it inconvenient to fetch it when it was ready for delivery after certain repairs had been done, he wrote to the garage proprietor, saying :

“I would be extremely obliged if you would endeavour to deliver lorry at my premises on Sunday, Feb. 29, 1948, as urgently required.”

The lorry was driven by the garage proprietor in accordance with that request, and at that time he had no insurance policy in respect of that lorry. The lorry was only covered if it was being driven by the respondent or any duly authorised person in his employ. It would follow, therefore, contrary to the opinion of the justices, that, when it was being driven by the garage proprietor, it was not being driven by a person in the respondent's employment. The garage proprietor was not employed by him.

The cases which have been cited to us show that scienter is not necessary, that is to say, a person who is ignorant of the fact that there is no policy of insurance covering a vehicle, may, nevertheless, be held to commit an offence if he permits the use of the vehicle. It is difficult to say that the respondent did not permit the garage proprietor to drive the lorry, because he asked him to do so, and the garage proprietor agreed. The respondent did not ask the garage proprietor whether he had a policy which would cover his driving of the lorry, and the respondent's policy clearly covered only the respondent. Therefore, this court feels that an offence has been committed, and the case must be sent back to the justices with a direction to convict.

The question then arises whether in the circumstances there were special reasons for not disqualifying the respondent for holding a licence under s. 35 (2) of the Act. Although it is primarily a matter for the justices, the court thinks that the case is entirely different from Rennison v. Knowler (1) where a man allowed a friend to drive his motor cycle in the belief that his own policy covered the cycle at the time, which it did not. In this case we think that there are special reasons. The request that the lorry should be delivered to the respondent's premises was made to a man who, in the ordinary course and according to the ordinary commercial experience of people, would be covered by a policy of insurance because his trade would require him to have such a policy to cover the driving of a lorry, e.g., for testing and for putting it on the road. We think the case must go back to the justices with a direction to convict, but with an intimation that there are ample grounds for the justices to find special reasons for not disqualifying the respondent for holding a licence under s. 35 (2) of the Act.

HILBERY, J.: I agree.

BIRKETT, J.: I also agree.

Case remitted.

Solicitors : Torr & Co., agents for Richard John, Cardiff (for the appellant).
[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Explained. Re MCGREADY. [1950]
1 All E.R. 30.

SHEARS v. MATTHEWS.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.),
November 23, 1948.]

Highway—Negligence of driver causing hurt to a person—Injury to cyclist by driver opening door of stationary motor lorry—Highway Act, 1835 (c. 50), s. 78.

On arriving at his destination a lorry driver opened the door on the off-side of his lorry, and, in doing so, struck a cyclist who was passing. He was charged under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 78, which makes it an offence for "the driver of any carriage whatsoever on any part of any highway . . . by negligence or wilful misbehaviour" to "cause any hurt or damage to any person . . . passing or being upon such highway."

HELD : section 78 was aimed at negligence in driving and did not cover an act which had no connection with driving, and, therefore, assuming that the lorry driver was guilty of negligence, he had not committed an offence under the section, as his negligence was not in connection with driving.

[AS TO DRIVING OFFENCES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 31, p. 664, para. 971 ; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 26, pp. 437, 438, Nos. 1547-1558.]

CASE STATED by Wiltshire justices.

The respondent, a lorry driver, opened the off-side door of the lorry while it was stationary in a street, and the door struck and injured a cyclist who was passing. On Apr. 5, 1948, the respondent was charged before a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at Melksham, with having committed an offence under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 78. The information was dismissed by the justices, and the Divisional Court now dismissed an appeal from their decision.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.

J. T. Molony for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by justices of Wiltshire. They dismissed an information preferred by a police officer who certainly showed some ingenuity in charging the respondent, who was the driver of a motor lorry, with a criminal offence. The facts show that, having got to his destination, the respondent opened the door of the lorry and thereby struck a cyclist who was passing the lorry. I am assuming for the purpose of this judgment, though the justices do not find it as a fact, that the respondent was guilty of negligence. The question is whether he committed an offence under the Highway Act, 1835, s. 78, which provides :

" . . . if the driver of any carriage whatsoever on any part of any highway shall by negligence or wilful misbehaviour cause any hurt or damage to any person, horse, cattle, or goods conveyed in any carriage, passing or being upon such highway, or shall quit the same, and go on the other side of the hedge or fence inclosing the same, or negligently or wilfully be at such distance from such carriage, or in such a situation whilst it shall be passing upon such highway that he cannot have the direction and government of the horses or cattle drawing the same, or shall leave any cart or carriage on such highway, so as to obstruct the passage thereof . . . "

he shall commit an offence.

It is clear from the wording of the section that it is aimed at negligence in driving, and not at a mere casual act of negligence which has no connection with driving. In this case the respondent opened the door of his motor lorry without noticing that there was a cyclist passing by. It would be strange if he were regarded as committing an offence, but, if a passenger in the lorry had opened the door, the passenger would not be committing an offence. The justices put their opinion in this way :

"We were of opinion that the respondent had not committed an offence against the Highway Act, 1835, s. 78, because he was not the driver of the carriage or motor lorry at the time of the said accident to Margaret Phyllis Chilcott within the meaning and intention of the said section, and accordingly dismissed the information."

Perhaps that is a little unfortunately put, because, obviously, the respondent was the driver, but the negligence, if there were any, was not in connection with the driving. In my view, therefore, it was not a case within the section and the justices were right in dismissing the summons, although, as I have said, they did not express their finding in quite the true manner. The respondent was the driver, and it is not denied that he was, but the action it is alleged he committed would not, even if negligence were found, bring the case within the section. For these reasons, this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

HILBERY, J. : I am of the same opinion.

BIRKETT, J. : I agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors : Collyer-Bristow & Co., agents for A. G. Smith & Son, Melksham (for the appellant); Pattinson & Brewer, agents for Lemon, Humphreys & Parker, Swindon (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

HUNT v. MORGAN.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 23, December 1, 1948.]

Hackney Carriage—Taxicab—Metropolitan police district—"Plying for hire"—Obligation to accept fare while travelling along street—London Hackney Carriage Act, 1853 (c. 33), ss. 7, 17 (2).

By the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1853, s. 7: "The driver of every hackney carriage which shall ply for hire at any place within the limits of this Act shall (unless such driver have a reasonable excuse, to be allowed by the justice before whom the matter shall be brought in question), drive such hackney carriage to any place to which he shall be required by the hirer thereof to drive the same not exceeding six miles from the place where the same shall have been hired . . ." and by s. 17 (2): "Every driver of a hackney carriage who shall refuse to drive such carriage to any place within the limits of this Act . . . to which he shall be required to drive any person hiring or intending to hire such carriage" shall be guilty of an offence.

On July 8, 1947, the appellant, a taxicab driver, was driving along a London street with the flag of the taximeter in the "For hire" position when he was hailed by a person wishing to hire the taxicab. The appellant, without reasonable excuse, refused to stop and accept the fare.

HELD : a taxicab driver commits no offence under the Act of 1853 by refusing to stop when hailed and can only be required to accept anyone who chooses to hire him when his cab is on a rank or in certain circumstances is stationary in a street, and, therefore, the appellant was not liable to conviction under s. 17 (2).

[FOR ACTS RELATING TO HACKNEY CARRIAGES AND CABS IN LONDON, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 19, pp. 106-172.]

Case referred to :

(1) Goodman v. Serle, [1942] 2 All E.R. 318; [1947] K.B. 808; 177 L.T. 521; 111 J.P. 492; 2nd Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by County of London Quarter Sessions.

The appellant was convicted by a metropolitan magistrate sitting at Bow Street Magistrate's Court of unlawfully refusing to drive a motor hackney carriage to a place within the limits of the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1853, not exceeding six miles, to which he was required to drive by a person intending to hire such carriage, contrary to s. 17 (2) of the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1853, and was fined 10s. The appellant was driving a taxicab in Victoria Street, London, S.W. The taxicab was not already hired and the flag of the taximeter was in the "For hire" position and not covered. A person was standing on a road "island" in Victoria Street, and, as the appellant's taxicab approached the "island," this person made clear signals and shouted to indicate that he desired to hire the taxicab. The appellant saw the person and realised that he wished to hire the taxicab, but did not stop on the ground that, in his view, the person was under the influence of drink. The appellant passed the "island," heard the person calling out "I will report you," and still did not stop. The intending passenger was not drunk or under the influence of drink. Quarter sessions dismissed an appeal by the appellant against the magistrates' decision and increased the fine to £1. The appellant now appealed to the Divisional Court who allowed the appeal and quashed the conviction.

Collard and Borders for the appellant.

Cassels for the respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 1. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment of the court. The appellant in this case was convicted before a metropolitan magistrate "for that he at Victoria Street, Westminster, being the driver of a motor hackney carriage did unlawfully refuse to drive the said carriage to a place within the limits of the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1853, not exceeding six miles, to which he was required to drive by a person intending to hire such carriage, contrary to s. 17 (2) of the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1853." The appellant appealed to the appeal committee of the quarter sessions for the County of London who dismissed the appeal and increased the fine imposed by the learned magistrate, but subject to a Case stated for the opinion of this court. The facts were that at 1 a.m. on July 8, 1947, the appellant was hailed by a person desiring to hire the cab at the corner of Victoria Street and Vauxhall Bridge Road. The appellant refused to stop and accept the fare, and the reason which he subsequently gave was that in his opinion the person hailing him was under the influence of drink. Both the learned magistrate and the appeal committee found that this opinion, if it was held by the appellant, was both inaccurate and unreasonable, from which it follows that he had no reasonable ground for refusing the fare if he was bound in law to drive him.

The question raised is whether a cruising taxicab driver is bound to accept anyone who hails him. It is obviously one of general importance, not only to cab drivers, but also to the members of the public, and it seems never to have been the subject of a decision. There is, no doubt, a widely held belief that a cabman, whether on the rank or not, is bound to accept a fare unless he has a reasonable excuse for refusing, and a full examination of the statutes relating to hackney carriages in London is necessary to decide whether this belief, which, at any rate, accords with the opinion both of the learned magistrate and the appeal committee, is well-founded.

The first Act dealing with hackney carriages in London to which it is necessary to refer is the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1831, an Act to amend the laws relating to hackney carriages and other conveyances. By s. 34 of that Act it was provided that :

" . . . the driver of every hackney carriage which shall be let for hire at any place within the distance of five miles from the General Post Office

... shall be obliged and compellable, if required by any person hiring such hackney carriage (unless such driver shall have a reasonable excuse to be allowed by the justices . . .) to drive such hackney carriage to any place to which he shall be so required to drive the same within the distance of five miles . . .”

A That Act repealed a very large number of old statutes which dealt with hackney carriages and coaches in London as well as other means of transport. In that Act no reference is made to standing places or, as they are commonly called, cab ranks. A reference to contemporary literature will, however, show that unofficial cab ranks did exist in London at that time, as it may be remembered that Mr. Pickwick, on May 13, 1827, set out for the Golden Cross in a cab which was the first one on the rank at St. Martins-le-Grand in order to get the coach for Rochester, but we have not been able to find any Act regulating or setting up cab ranks before the London Hackney Carriages Act, 1843. Section 29 of that Act provided that it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of Police to appoint standings for hackney carriages at such places as they shall think convenient within the Metropolitan Police District and to make regulations concerning them, and s. 33 provided that :

“ . . . every driver of a hackney carriage who shall ply for hire elsewhere than at some standing or place appointed for that purpose, or who by loitering . . . shall cause any obstruction in . . . any public street . . . shall for every such offence forfeit [a fine].”

D It may be observed that in this Act, as in another Act dealing with the subject, it seems as though to stand and to ply for hire are used as interchangeable terms meaning the same thing. For instance, in s. 31 of the 1843 Act, it is provided that nothing in the Act shall authorise any cab (which expression, for brevity, we shall use throughout to describe a hackney carriage) to stand or ply for hire opposite to the General Post Office in St. Martins-le-Grand, where obviously from the reference in Pickwick there used to be a rank. Section 33, it will be seen from the reference above, forbids a cabman to ply for hire otherwise than at a standing, so clearly for the purpose of the Act the word “ply” does not connote motion, as in common parlance it often does if one speaks of a vehicle or ferry boat plying between certain points.

We now turn to the London Hackney Carriage Act, 1853, under which the appellant was summoned. By s. 7, it is provided :

“The driver of every [cab] which shall ply for hire at any place within the limits of this Act shall (unless such driver have a reasonable excuse, to be allowed by the justice before whom the matter shall be brought in question) drive such [cab] to any place to which he shall be required by the hirer thereof to drive the same, not exceeding six miles . . .”

and by s. 17 (2) it is provided that the driver of a cab who shall commit any of the offences therein specified shall be liable to a penalty, one of such offences being thus described :

“Every driver of a [cab] who shall refuse to drive [it] to any place within the limits of this Act, not exceeding six miles, to which he shall be required to drive any person hiring or intending to hire such carriage . . .”

One must, however, turn back to s. 7, to which we have just referred, the section which imposes the duty on the driver and provides him with the defence of a reasonable excuse. The real question in this case is : What do the words in s. 7, “which shall ply for hire at any place within the limits of this Act,” mean ? Have they got the popular meaning which would certainly include a cab driving down a street with the flag up on which the words “For hire” appear, or must they be confined to the cabman on the rank ? In our opinion, with one exception which we will mention hereafter, it is only the cabman on the rank who is obliged to accept a fare. The plying for hire referred to in s. 7, which is the material section, must, we think, be so confined. It refers to the driver of every cab which shall ply for hire at any place within the limits of the Act and that must, in our opinion, refer to a place appointed for the standing of hackney carriages under the Act of 1843, which is to be read together with and as part of the Act of 1853. "Place" must mean a definite point, just as the same word later in the section clearly refers to a definite destination to which the driver is required to go. It cannot mean "anywhere in a street." This view is reinforced by the fact that it is actually made an offence for a cab driver to ply for hire elsewhere than at one of those places. No doubt, the cabman who has set down a fare and is proceeding to one of those places can accept a fare if he is hailed, and it could not, we think, be held, unless he was soliciting fares as he drove along the street, that he was committing an offence against s. 33 of the Act of 1843.

That it is the standing cab and not the moving cab that must accept a fare seems to be shown also by s. 35 of the Act of 1831. As we have already said, that Act contained no provision with regard to cab ranks or standing places, but it does provide that :

"Every [cab] . . . found standing in any street or place . . . shall, unless actually hired, be deemed to be plying for hire, although such [cab] shall not be on any standing or place usually appropriated for the purpose of [cabs] standing or plying for hire . . ."

The onus of proving that he was actually hired at the time of his refusal is laid on the driver. This section is unrepealed, and it would, therefore, appear that, if a cab is standing in the street, having, for instance, just set down a passenger, the driver is bound to accept as a fare any person who desires to be driven, provided that person so informs the driver while he is still stationary and not engaged. At any rate, it seems to us clear that a cab driver commits no offence under the Act of 1853 by refusing to stop when hailed, and that he can only be required to accept anyone who chooses to hire him when he is actually on a rank or is stationary in a street.

It may not be inappropriate to hope that this matter will receive the attention of the appropriate authority which, in relation to cabs, is the Home Secretary. Conditions in 1948 are very different from what they were in 1853, when taxicabs were unknown. At present, every taxicab which is not actually hired must be driven with the flag of the taximeter in the upward position, and the words "For hire" appear on it. Modern taxicabs are now fitted with devices illuminated at night which show on the front of the roof the words "Taxi" or "For hire," and the public may well believe that in those circumstances it is open to them to demand to be driven in any cab which is not actually conveying a passenger. It is evident that in the middle of the last century when all cabs were horse-drawn, the legislature desired to discourage the crawling cab, which might easily cause obstruction in the street, for the horse would naturally be allowed to proceed at a walking pace if the cab was not actually hired. Therefore, it may well have seemed to the legislature in those days that it was desirable so far as possible to ensure that the hiring of cabs should take place at recognised ranks and not casually in the streets. Under modern conditions, the cruising taxicab is one of the commonest sights in London streets. We have, however, to deal with the law as it stands and must see that the existing statutes are not strained so as to make a man guilty of an offence unless the words of the section clearly apply to his case. A full consideration of those sections shows that the expression "Like the cabman on the rank," so often applied with regard to people bound to accept employment if offered, for instance, members of the Bar, is well-founded. It is also to be remembered that there are no fewer than six Acts on the statute book dealing with cabs in London, Acts of 1831, 1843, 1850, 1853, 1869 and 1907. Some of the sections in these numerous statutes are obsolete. Many are obscure, as may be seen from the judgment of this court in Goodman v. Serle (1), and others, as this case shows, are out of date. It is, therefore, not surprising that cab drivers, the police, and magistrates, to say nothing of the general public, have difficulty in ascertaining the law on this subject and make mistakes about it. It would seem that an Act consolidating and amending, and, if possible, simplifying, the law with regard to cabs, is very desirable. The appeal is allowed with costs here and before the appeal committee.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Seifert, Sedley & Co. (for the appellant); Solicitor for the Metropolitan Police (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

GARDNER v. JAMES.

C [KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, JJ.), November 30, 1948.]

Road Traffic—Insurance against third party risks—Use of motor vehicle not covered by insurance policy—Dismissal of charge under Probation of Offenders Act, 1907 (c. 17), s. 1 (1)—“Special reasons”—Good character—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 35 (1) (2).

D The respondent was charged, inter alia, with driving a motor cycle on the road without there being in force in relation to the user of it by him a policy of insurance or security for third party risks. He had only been demobilised from the army a few weeks before the commission of the offence and had purchased the motor cycle which he had assembled himself and was anxious to test. He was stopped a short distance from the garage in which the machine was kept. The justices dismissed the charge under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1 (1), on the ground that the respondent was of good character and having regard to the extenuating circumstances in which the offence was committed.

E HELD: this was not a case which could be dealt with under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907; it was a deliberate commission of an offence; and there were no reasons constituting “special circumstances” entitling the justices to refuse to suspend the licence.

F Quelch v. Collett ([1948] 1 All E.R. 252; [1948] 1 K.B. 478), distinguished.

[AS TO COMPULSORY INSURANCE OF MOTOR VEHICLES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 18, pp. 560-563, paras. 907-912.]

G FOR THE ROAD TRAFFIC ACT, 1930, s. 35, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 23, p. 636.]

Cases referred to:

(1) Whittall v. Kirby, [1946] 2 All E.R. 552; [1947] K.B. 194; [1947] L.J.R. 234; 175 L.T. 449; 111 J.P. 1; 2nd Digest Supp.

(2) Quelch v. Collett, [1948] 1 All E.R. 252; [1948] 1 K.B. 478; [1948] L.J.R. 956; 112 J.P. 167.

H CASE STATED by Warwick justices.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Royal Leamington Spa, the respondent was charged (inter alia) that he did use a motor cycle there not being in force in relation to the user thereof such policy of insurance or such security in respect of third party risks as complied with Part II of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, contrary to s. 35 of the said Act. The justices dismissed the information under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1 (1).

At the hearing the following facts were proved. The respondent was driving a motor cycle at 8.35 p.m. on May 19, 1948. When stopped by a police constable and asked to produce his insurance certificate he was unable to do so and said: "I am buying this motor cycle from my boss, the R. Garage, where I work. I have not got an insurance certificate. I had the bike about two weeks ago and this is the first time I have had it out." A director of R. Garage, Ltd., the respondent's employer, stated that he had sold the motor cycle in question to the respondent on or about Apr. 20, 1948, and that the machine was not covered by insurance. The justices were of the opinion that the respondent's behaviour had been foolish to a degree, but that the offences referred to in the informations had all arisen from the same circumstances and resulted from the same cause, namely, his over-eagerness to test the machine which he had assembled himself after being demobilised from the army. They took the view that it was possible, in view of the habit which the respondent would form in the army of driving without the requisite documents appertaining to civilian drivers, that he had, in his enthusiasm to test the machine, lost sight of the need to obtain an insurance certificate, and that the appropriate course would be to dismiss the information under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, s. 1 (1), having taken into account the effect of the decision in Quelch v. Collett (2). Being apprised of the respondent's good character and record, they felt that the circumstances of the case justified them in saying that, having regard to the health, character and antecedents of the respondent and the extenuating circumstances in which the offence was committed, it was inexpedient to inflict any punishment under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35, and in dismissing the information on ordering the respondent to pay 4s. costs. The Divisional Court now allowed an appeal by the prosecutor.

Vernon Gattie for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by justices of the borough of Royal Leamington Spa, before whom the respondent was charged with three separate offences, driving a motor cycle without a road fund licence, driving a motor cycle which was uninsured, and driving a motor cycle for which he had no driving licence. In respect of the offences relating to road fund and driving licences, the justices convicted and fined him. They were comparatively trivial offences because, although relating to a matter in which the Exchequer is much concerned, they arise from defaults which can easily be remedied. The offence of driving a motor cycle without an insurance policy being in force, however, is a very serious thing, and one wonders what would have been thought in this case if, while the respondent was riding his motor cycle, he had run into somebody and either killed or seriously injured him. He was a mechanic at a weekly wage, and could not have contributed any substantial sum in damages, and, there being no insurance, the injured person would have got no compensation. Happily, there was not an accident, but the justices dealt with this offence under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, and imposed no penalty. The only reason they have set out for doing that is good character, but that is no reason, as the well-known leading case of Whittall v. Kirby (1) clearly decides, for their refusing to suspend the respondent's licence, and, if his mere good character cannot be a "special circumstance" for that purpose, how much less can it be a reason for refusing to convict? One is driven, in spite of what the justices have said, to the conclusion that the only reason they refused to convict and dealt with the case under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, was to avoid imposing a disqualification. They tell us that the respondent did not want a motor cycle for the purposes of his work, and so there was not even an element of hardship to be taken into account.

This case is not in pari materia to Quelch v. Collett (2) to which the justices refer. The court thought the justices could deal with that case under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, because there the defendant had been misled into thinking that he was insured. There was an insurance policy in force in respect of the motor vehicle which was being used in that case, the person who had sold the motor vehicle had undertaken to get the policy transferred, and, in the belief that it had been transferred, the defendant used the car. In the present case, there was no such circumstance at all. The respondent knew perfectly well that (a) he had not a road licence, (b) he had not a driving licence, and (c) he had not an insurance certificate, and he knew that he ought to have all those three things. Yet, with regard to the charge relating to the insurance certificate, the justices say that the case can be dealt with under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907. It is not the class of case which can be so dealt with. It is an entirely different case from Quelch v. Collett (2). The offence was deliberately committed. This case must go back to the justices with a direction that a conviction must be registered, with the usual consequences.

HILBERY, J. : I agree.

BIRKETT, J. : I agree.

Solicitors : Sharpe, Pritchard & Co. (for the appellant).

[Reported by F. GUTTMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

NEILD v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 16, 17, 26, 1948.]

Excess Profits Tax—Exemption—Profession—Profits dependent on personal qualifications—Severance of trade from profession—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), s. 12 (3).

By s. 12 (1) of Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, where the profits arising from any trade or business to which the section applies exceed the standard profits, the excess shall be liable to excess profits tax, but sub-s. (3) provides : "The carrying on of a profession by an individual or by individuals in partnership shall not be deemed to be the carrying on of a trade or business to which this section applies if the profits of the profession are dependent wholly or mainly on his or their personal qualifications."

The taxpayer, a member of the British Optical Association, the Worshipful Company of Spectacle Makers and the Joint Council of Qualified Opticians, carried on the activities of an optician, in the course of which he examined patients' eyes by appointment. If disease were found, he advised the patient to consult a doctor, but if no disease were found he prescribed and supplied spectacles. On occasion he would also make up spectacles from other people's prescriptions. On his appeal against an assessment to excess profits tax on the profits of his activities the commissioners found that they were mainly of a commercial nature, but that £750 out of a total profit of £2,902 was derived from the carrying on of a profession and was dependent wholly or mainly on the personal qualifications of the taxpayer.

HELD : a business can be treated as severable, so that part of the profits are to be regarded as derived from a trade and part from a profession, only if it can be found as a fact that two separate businesses are being carried on at one and the same time ; in the present case there was only one business, found to be mainly of a commercial nature ; and accordingly, there was no evidence that part of the profits were derived from the carrying on of a profession and were dependent wholly or mainly on the taxpayer's personal qualifications ; and, therefore, the whole of the profits of the business were assessable to excess profits tax.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Maxse ([1919] 1 K.B. 647 ; 120 L.T. 680), distinguished.

Decision of MACNAGHTEN, J. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 405), reversed.

[FOR THE FINANCE (No. 2) ACT, 1939, s. 12 (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 32, p. 1193.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Carr v. Inland Revenue Comrs., [1944] 2 All E.R. 163 ; 171 L.T. 177 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Maxse, [1919] 1 K.B. 647 ; 88 L.J.K.B. 752 ; 120 L.T. 680 ; 12 Tax Cas. 41 ; Digest Supp.
- (3) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Ransom (William) & Son, Ltd., [1918] 2 K.B. 709 ; 88 L.J.K.B. 342 ; 119 L.T. 369 ; 12 Tax Cas. 21 ; Digest Supp.
- (4) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Marx (R.J.), 5 A.T.C. 25.

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., dated July 26, 1946, and reported [1946] 2 All E.R. 405, on a Case stated by General Commissioners of Income Tax.

The taxpayer was assessed to excess profits tax at a figure of £1,042 in respect of excess profits based on his total profits for the chargeable accounting period ending Apr. 5, 1943, of £2,902. On appeal by the taxpayer the commissioners held that £750 of that profit was professional, and the remainder trading, profit, but they did not say whether they affirmed or reduced the assessment. The matter was brought before them a second time, by agreement, and this hearing was treated as an adjourned hearing, when the commissioners resolved that the appeal should be dismissed since the taxpayer's business was mainly of a "commercial" nature. On appeal, MACNAGHTEN, J., held that the £750 which was due to the carrying on of the profession of an oculist ought to be deducted from the sum representing the combined profits of both the profession and the trade carried on by the taxpayer and made an order that the assessment be reduced by £750. From this decision the Crown appealed to the Court of Appeal ([1947] 1 All E.R. 480), who remitted the case to the commissioners requesting them to answer two specific questions, reserving the question whether there was any evidence to support the findings as contained in the original Case or as might be contained in the supplemental Case. The commissioners answered these questions as follows : (1) That the profit of £750 was derived from the carrying on of a profession, and (2) that that profit, so derived, was dependent wholly or mainly on the personal qualifications of the taxpayer.

Both Cases now came before the Court of Appeal, who held that there was no evidence to support the findings of the commissioners, and allowed the Crown's appeal.

Mitchison, K.C., J. H. Stamp and R. P. Hills, for the Crown.

J. W. P. Clements for the taxpayer.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26. TUCKER, L.J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from a judgment of MACNAGHTEN, J., in a case in which the taxpayer, John Neild, had been assessed at a figure of £1,402 in respect of excess profits based on total profits amounting to £2,902. He appealed from that decision by way of Case Stated which duly came before MACNAGHTEN, J. : see [1946] 2 All E.R. 405. MACNAGHTEN, J., reduced the assessment by eliminating £750 out of the total profits, on the basis that, on his reading of the Case Stated, the taxpayer was really carrying on two businesses, one the profession of optician and the other the trade of spectacle maker, and that, accordingly, his assessment should be reduced to the extent of the profits which resulted from the profession. The matter arises under the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 12, which provides :

“(1) Where the profits arising in any chargeable accounting period from any trade or business to which this section applies exceed the standard profits, there shall, subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, be charged on the excess a tax (to be called excess profits tax) equal to three-fifths of the excess.”

Sub-section (2) provides :

“Subject as hereafter provided, the trades and businesses to which this section applies are all trades or businesses of any description carried on in the United Kingdom, or carried on, whether personally or through an agent, by persons ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom.”

By sub-s. (3) :

“The carrying on of a profession by an individual or by individuals in partnership shall not be deemed to be the carrying on of a trade or business to which this section applies if the profits of the profession are dependent wholly or mainly on his or their personal qualifications.”

From that decision of MACNAGHTEN, J., the Crown appealed (see [1947] 1 All E.R. 480), and, when the case came before the Court of Appeal, the court were in doubt whether the findings of the commissioners were intended to amount to findings of the carrying on of what I call, for convenience, two separate businesses, namely, a profession and a trade, and, accordingly, the matter was remitted to the commissioners who were requested to answer two specific questions. Those questions were ([1947] 1 All E.R. 483) :

- “1. Whether the profit, the taxpayer appealed from, or any, and, if so, what, part thereof, was derived from the carrying on of a profession.
2. If question 1 is answered in the affirmative, whether the profit so derived was dependent wholly or mainly on the personal qualifications of the appellant.”

Before taking that course, the court clearly intimated that, when those questions were answered and the case could be considered in its entirety, the question was reserved whether there was any evidence to support the findings as contained in the original Case or in the Supplemental Case. The commissioners having answered the questions, the Case comes before us, and the matter which falls to be decided now is whether, on these two Cases, there was evidence to support a finding that there were two businesses being carried on.

It is now necessary to refer to the facts as found in the two Cases. They were that since Nov. 5, 1935, Mr. Neild has carried on the activities of an optician in Lincoln, and, that :

“... he is and was during the chargeable accounting period in question a member of the British Optical Association and the Worshipful Company of Spectacle Makers and the Joint Council of Qualified Opticians. His premises include a waiting room and a consulting room. Optical frames without glasses and unpriced are exhibited in a show window at the entrance to his premises. The general procedure adopted by him in the carrying on of his activities is as follows :—(a) An appointment is made. (b) Eyes are examined for disease, and if disease is found the person is advised to consult an eye doctor. (c) If no disease is found, the refraction of the eyes is worked out. (d) Lenses are then prescribed having regard to the type of work, etc., the person is engaged on. (e) Rough lenses are then cut at the correct angles in accordance with the prescription. (f) ... his mechanics shape and frame them. (g) The appellant tests the correctness of the spectacles when completed. The estimated average number of examinations made per day is 15. A fee of 10s. 6d. is charged for examination of the eyes and supplying the prescription in cases where he himself does not make the spectacles and a fee of 5s. for examination without a prescription. A fee of 5s. is included in the inclusive charge for examination and the supplying of spectacles. Spectacles are on occasion made up from other people's prescriptions. He advertises in the local press, in magazines, and on cinema screens and 'buses, and such advertising is carried out on lines approved by the British Optical Association."

The commissioners found that: "The gross profit, i.e., the profit before debiting the overhead expenses, was £4,185, and the nett profit of the said chargeable accounting period in question as computed for purposes of excess profits tax was £2,902." The commissioners held that £750 of the profit of £2,902 for the chargeable accounting period ending on Apr. 5, 1943, was professional and the remainder trading profit. They having so found, the first hearing ended, but, the inspector of taxes and the accountant representing the taxpayer having agreed that on those findings the matter was not concluded and that further findings were necessary and desirable, the matter was brought before the commissioners a second time, by agreement, and the further hearing was treated as an adjourned hearing. At that hearing the accountant representing the taxpayer contended that the fact that the taxpayer sold spectacles did not preclude him from being treated as a professional man, and quoted from the case of Carr v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1). The Crown contended:

"(a) That the taxpayer's business was a single activity and not two separate activities one of which was professional and the other a merchant's business. (b) That, as the commissioners had found that out of a profit of £2,902 only £750 represented professional profit, the taxpayer was not carrying on a profession the profits from which were dependent wholly or mainly on his personal qualifications. (c) That the whole of his profits were liable to assessment to excess profits tax and the assessment should be confirmed. The commissioners resolved that the appeal be dismissed as, in their opinion, the taxpayer's business was mainly of a commercial nature, and, therefore, liable to excess profits tax."

That was the position in which the matter stood before the Case was remitted to the commissioners for a further hearing. As a result of the further hearing, a Supplemental Case was stated, answering the specific questions which had been put by this court, as follows:

"On June 26, 1947, we heard both parties to the appeal. We reconsidered the facts and evidence on which we stated the Case dated Mar. 11, 1946. We heard no further evidence. We, the commissioners, answer the questions set out in the order of the Court of Appeal dated Mar. 7, 1947, as follows:—(1) That of the profit, the subject of the assessment appealed from, £750 was derived from the carrying on of a profession. (2) That the profit of £750, so derived, was dependent wholly or mainly on the personal qualifications of the appellant."

The question which now falls to be decided is whether, on the facts set out in the Case, there was any evidence on which the commissioners could find that part of the profit of the taxpayer's business was derived from the carrying on of a profession. I am prepared to assume that the findings in the Supplemental Case must be taken to involve a finding of the existence of a separate profession. This requires consideration of the principle to be derived from Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Maxse (2). In that case Mr. Maxse was the proprietor, editor and publisher of the NATIONAL REVIEW. He was also a journalist and as such contributed most of the articles to the NATIONAL REVIEW, for which he received no remuneration other than the profits derived from the sale of the magazine. He was assessed to excess profits duty, but on appeal he was held by the commissioners to be exempt on the ground that he was carrying on a profession the profits of which were dependent mainly on his personal qualifications. SANKEY, J., on appeal, held that on the facts found he was conducting an ordinary commercial business and that there was no evidence that he was carrying on a profession within the meaning of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, s. 39. Up to this point neither Mr. Maxse nor the Crown had contended that the business carried on by him was severable and consisted of (a) the profession of journalist and (b) the trade of publisher. In the Court of Appeal, however, SWINFEN EADY, M.R., took this point in the course of the argument and the court ultimately held that this was the true view on the facts found. It is one of only two reported cases where this process of severance has been upheld. The other is Inland Revenue Comrs. v. William Ransom & Son, Ltd. (3), where a company owned a factory in which they carried on business as manufacturing chemists and also occupied a farm where they grew herbs for the purpose of the factory. It was held that there was evidence to support the finding that the company was engaged in husbandry (which was exempt from excess profits duty) and that as it was possible for the commissioners to separate the business of husbandry from the other business there was nothing in law to prevent them from doing so.

In Ransom's case (3) there was complete physical separation in fact, and the commissioners found that the profits of the farm could be ascertained and excluded from the profits of the business as a whole. With regard to Maxse's case (2), I adopt the language used by WARRINGTON, L.J., in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Marx (4) (5 A.T.C. 30), where he said:

"In my opinion in order to bring the case within the principle of Maxse's case (2) there must be a finding that the taxpayer in question was carrying on—supposing he were carrying on a professional business—he was carrying on a profession separate from the trade or business, and that the profits of the profession so carried on were severable from the profits of the trade or business, so that when so severed those profits might be exempted from excess profits duty . . ."

This shows that it is erroneous to say, "Here is a business which involves substantial professional activities and substantial business activities, we will accordingly apportion the profits equitably between the two." It is necessary to find that there are, in fact, two separate businesses being carried on at one and the same time. I do not think the commissioners in the present case could have found as they have if they had applied the correct test—in other words, there was, in my opinion, no evidence to support their finding. The business carried on by the taxpayer was, in fact, one business. By its very nature it required a man with professional qualifications to carry it on and part of his activities were purely professional, but it did not, thereby, become two separate businesses. I think that when MACNAGHTEN, J., said in the present case ([1946] 2 All E.R. 407) with reference to Maxse's case (2):

"The Court of Appeal held that he was carrying on the trade of a publisher and he was also carrying on the profession of a writer, and that the sum which ought to be allowed to Maxse for his literary contributions ought to be deducted from the profits arising from the sale of the review."

he was stating the result of that case rather too widely and using language which might cause the commissioners to overlook the fact that separation and severability are, as stated by WARRINGTON, L.J., essential to the proper application of the principle in Maxse's case (2).

In the result, therefore, I have arrived at the conclusion that there is nothing in the original Case or the Supplemental Case to justify a finding that any part of the profit, the subject of the assessment appealed from, was derived from the carrying on of a separate and severable profession, which is how the finding of the commissioners must be read if the reduction of £750 from the profits ordered by MACNAGHTEN, J., is to stand. Whether or not there is a separate and severable profession is, of course, a question of fact. This was emphasised by WARRINGTON, L.J., in his judgment in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Marx (4) referred to above. In my view, the commissioners could only have arrived at their findings in the Supplemental Case on the view that there were professional activities involved in the business which they valued at £750. There was no evidence to support a finding that the profession was separate and severable from the trade, which finding is necessary if the assessment based on the total profits is to be reduced.

On this footing the findings of the commissioners in both the cases must be approached on the basis that there was, in fact, at all times only one business. The commissioners have found in the original Case that £750 of the total profits of £2,902 was professional and the remainder trading profit. They also found the business was mainly of a commercial nature, and in the Supplemental Case they have found that only £750 of the profit was dependent wholly or mainly on the personal qualifications of the taxpayer. I think it would be impossible on these findings to hold that this business, regarded as a whole, is a profession the profits of which are dependent wholly or mainly on the personal qualifications of the taxpayer. Accordingly, the case can be dealt with on the findings of the commissioners without the necessity of its being once more remitted to them for further findings, a course which is clearly to be avoided unless we are compelled to adopt it. For these reasons I would allow this appeal from the judgment of MACNAGHTEN, J., and restore the original assessment of £1,402.

COHEN, L.J.: I agree.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal allowed with costs (there being an arrangement as to costs satisfactory to both sides).

Solicitors: Waterhouse & Co. (for the taxpayer); Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

LOWE AND ANOTHER v. STC

Considered. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. HAYS WHARF CARTAGE LTD. [1953] 2 All E.R. 34.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Hilbery and Birkett, J.J.), November 26, 1948.]

Motor Vehicle—Licence—Rate of duty—Altered condition of vehicle—Removable boards fitted to sides of lorry—Whether “loose equipment”—Finance Act, 1922 (c. 17), s. 14 (1) (2)—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (c. 43), s. 26.

To enable a motor lorry to carry coal slack without scattering it on the road, boards were fitted to the sides of the vehicle by means of slots. The unladen weight of the vehicle was just under 3 tons without the boards and just over 3 tons with the boards, and the boards were not fitted when the vehicle was used for other purposes. The vehicle was licensed as a 3 ton vehicle and the appellants were charged, under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14 (2), with unlawfully using it in an altered condition which brought it within a class of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was applicable under s. 14 (1). The appellants contended that, under the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26, the boards should not be included in calculating the weight of the vehicle as they were “loose equipment” within the meaning of that section.

HELD: since the result of fixing the boards to the vehicle was that the vehicle was capable of carrying much larger loads, the boards could not be regarded merely as “loose equipment” within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26, so as not to be included in the weight of the vehicle (Darling v. Burton (1928 S.C. (J.) 11) distinguished), and, therefore, the vehicle was being used in an "altered condition" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14 (1), and the appellants were liable to a penalty under s. 14 (2).

[AS TO LICENCES FOR MECHANICALLY-PROPELLED VEHICLES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 28, pp. 425-431, paras. 923-928, and 1948 Supplement.]

Case referred to :

(1) Darling v. Burton, 1928 S.C. (J.) 11 ; Digest Supp.

CASE STATED by Kidderminster justices.

On May 7, 1948, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Kidderminster, the appellants were charged, under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14 (2), with having failed to pay the higher rate of duty to which a mechanically-propelled vehicle became chargeable, under s. 14 (1), by reason of the fact that it was used in an altered condition. The vehicle had been licensed as a vehicle used for the conveyance of goods and as weighing not more than 3 tons, and an annual licence of £35 had been taken out in respect of it under the Finance Act, 1920, s. 13 and sched. II, para. 5 [as amended by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1945, s. 4 (3) and sched. II, pt. II.] On Mar. 3, 1948, it was carrying a load of coal slack, and to prevent the slack from scattering on the road, boards were attached to the sides of the lorry by means of slots. The lorry had been used with the boards on several occasions, although on the majority of occasions that it had been in use it was used without the boards. It weighed 2 tons, 19 cwt., 3 qrs., without the boards, and 3 tons, 1 cwt., 1 qr., with the boards. The appellants contended that the boards were "loose equipment" within the meaning of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26, and, therefore, should not be included in calculating the weight of the vehicle. The justices held that the boards could not be regarded as loose equipment, but were alternative parts which had been ordinarily used with the vehicle, within the meaning of s. 26 of the Act of 1930, and that the vehicle had been used in an altered condition, within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14 (1), and, accordingly, they convicted the appellants and fined them £2. The Divisional Court now dismissed the appeal from the decision of the justices.

D. Karmel for the appellants.

J. G. Foster for the respondent.

LORD GODDARD, C.J. : This is a Case stated by justices of the borough of Kidderminster before whom the appellants were charged that they did unlawfully use a vehicle, while a particular licence was in force, in an altered condition which brought it, under the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14, within a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty was applicable. The justices convicted the appellants and imposed on them a small fine. I do not pretend that I have found this case an easy one, and I confess that my mind has fluctuated a good deal during the course of the argument, but I have come to the conclusion that the justices were right. I am not going to base my judgment solely on the ground that this is a question of fact, but I think that the justices came to the right decision on the evidence.

It is necessary to look at two sections of two different Acts of Parliament. The Finance Act, 1922, s. 14, which creates the offence with which the appellants were charged, provides :

"(1) Where a licence has been taken out for a mechanically-propelled vehicle at any rate under the Finance Act, 1920, sched. 2, and the vehicle is at any time while such licence is in force used in an altered condition or in a manner or for a purpose which brings it within, or which if it was used solely in that condition or in that manner or for that purpose would bring it within, a class or description of vehicle to which a higher rate of duty is applicable under the said schedule, duty at such higher rate shall become chargeable in respect of the licence for the vehicle."

Section 14 (2) imposes a penalty on a person who uses the vehicle in an altered condition without taking out a licence at the higher rate of duty.

The vehicle in the present case was said to be a 3 ton vehicle, and to find out whether it was a 3 ton vehicle or not one must refer to the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 26, which provides :

"For the purposes of this Part of this Act, and of any other enactment relating to the use of motor vehicles on roads, the weight unladen of any vehicle shall be taken to be the weight of the vehicle inclusive of the body and all parts (the heavier being taken where alternative bodies or parts are used) which are necessary to or ordinarily used with the vehicle when working on a road, but exclusive of the weight of water, fuel or accumulators used for the purpose of the supply of power for the propulsion of the vehicle, and of loose tools and loose equipment."

This lorry, which, in its ordinary use (if I may use that expression) would be a lorry not exceeding 3 tons unladen weight, was, on the day with which the informations were concerned, being used with boards fitted to its sides for the purpose of carrying a load of slack. I have no doubt that they were so fitted because the sides of the lorry were not high enough to contain the slack and prevent it falling on the road. The boards really formed part of the sides of the lorry.

It will be observed that the section with which we are primarily concerned, i.e., s. 14 of the Finance Act, 1922, speaks, not of the alteration of the lorry, but of using it "in an altered condition." It also provides that regard should be had to the fact whether, if the vehicle was used solely in that condition, it would attract a higher rate of duty. Therefore, a mere temporary use of a vehicle, if it is in an altered condition, attracts a penalty. The justices found that the vehicle had been altered and that the boards could not be regarded as loose equipment. If they had been loose equipment, they must be disregarded when ascertaining the unladen weight.

In support of his argument that the boards should be regarded as loose equipment, counsel for the appellants relied on Darling v. Burton (1), a Scottish case, in which the question was whether the trays with which bakers' vans are fitted should be regarded as loose equipment or as part of the van. The court held that those trays, which are merely put in the van to contain the bread, should be regarded as loose equipment. I respectfully agree that the judgment of the Lord Justice-General, LORD CLYDE, sitting in Justiciary, was right. The trays were no part of the van. They were shelves which were put into the van merely for holding the bread which was to be carried in the van. Their presence or absence made no difference to the van as a van, and they must necessarily be regarded as loose equipment. In fact, the presence of the shelves would tend to decrease, and not to increase, the load that was carried in the van, because, if the shelves were not in the van the bread could be packed much tighter than when it was placed in the ordinary manner on the shelves. In the present case the boards are affixed by means of slots to the sides of the van, with the result that the van is capable of carrying a much larger load. The sides of the van are built up with an additional structure, and, if that is done, it seems to me, on full consideration of the case, that the condition of the lorry is altered. If these boards were not fastened on to the lorry, the lorry would have a much smaller sill or surround, but when the boards are affixed, the containing part of the lorry (i.e., the part surrounded by boards or planks) is a great deal higher, which enables the lorry to carry much heavier loads. I think that if we held that the justices were wrong in this case and that the boards must be regarded merely as loose equipment, we would be opening a very wide door to evasions of the Finance Act, 1922, s. 14. Having regard to the fact that s. 14 refers to the "altered condition" of the van or lorry, we cannot say that the justices were in any way wrong in holding that this vehicle had been altered within the meaning of s. 14 by the affixing of the boards, which, in effect, turned the lorry into a vehicle the capacity of which for carrying was much greater than it would have been if that had not been done. I think the decision of the justices was right.

A Accordingly, this appeal fails.

HILBERY, J : For the reasons which my Lord has stated, I am of the same opinion.

BIRKETT, J. : I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

B Solicitors : Mawby, Barrie & Letts, agents for Chulow & Rudge, Brierley Hill (for the appellants) ; Treasury Solicitor (for the respondent).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

C ALBERT E. REED & CO., LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 19, 22, 1948.]

Excess Profits Tax—"Investments"—Temporary letting and requisition of business premises—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), sched. VII, pt. I, para. 6 (1).

D A company carried on business as paper manufacturers at premises which included two stock rooms. Owing to the restriction of business at the outbreak of war the company no longer required the use of the two stock rooms, and, therefore, one was let in 1940 for a term expiring three months after the termination of hostilities (with a proviso for prior determination by the lessees in certain events), and the other was requisitioned by the Admiralty in 1940. The company was assessed to

E excess profits tax in respect of the rent and compensation rent arising from the letting and requisition respectively. They contended that such rents were income received from investments within the meaning of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, pt. I, para. 6 (1), and that the rents were, accordingly, to be excluded from the profits for the purpose

F of excess profits tax, since it was agreed that the company did not come within para. 6 (2) (which requires the inclusion of income from investments in certain events). The Special Commissioners, interpreting the word "investment" in the ordinary business sense (an interpretation subse-

G quently prescribed by the Court of Appeal in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Desoutter Brothers, Ltd. ([1946] 1 All E.R. 58) found that the temporary letting of business premises—not in themselves in the nature of an investment—the use of which was temporarily not required by the company, did not create an investment in the business sense of the word. It was conceded that no distinction was to be drawn between the letting of the one stock room, and the requisition of the other.

H HELD : the question was one of fact, the commissioners were entitled to take into consideration the use to which the stock rooms had been put before the war, the temporary nature of the letting and requisition, and the probability of the return of the rooms to a commercial user in the future, and there was no evidence to justify the court in interfering with the finding of the commissioners, and, accordingly, the rents were not to be regarded as income received from investments, but fell to be included in profits for excess profits tax purposes.

Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Broadway Car Co. (Wimbledon), Ltd. ([1946] 2 All E.R. 609), distinguished.

Decision of SINGLETON, J., reversed.

[FOR THE FINANCE (No. 2) ACT, 1939, SCHED. VII, pt. I, para. 6, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 32, p. 1220.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Desoutter Bros., Ltd., [1946] 1 All E.R. 58 ; 174 L.T. 162 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (2) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Broadway Car Co. (Wimbledon), Ltd., [1946] 2 All E.R. 609 ; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Gas Lighting Improvement Co., Ltd., (1923), 129 L.T. 481 ; 12 Tax Cas. 503 ; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the Inland Revenue Commissioners from an order of SINGLETON, J., dated July 15, 1948, on a Case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The Special Commissioners had found that certain rents were not income from investments within the meaning of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, pt. I, para. 6 (1). Their finding was reversed by SINGLETON, J., but the Court of Appeal now restored the decision of the Special Commissioners. The facts appear in the judgment of TUCKER, L.J.

Sir Roland Burrows, K.C., and R. P. Hills for the Commissioners.
Donovan, K.C., and Graham-Dixon for the company.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22. TUCKER, L.J., read the following judgment. This case arises in connection with an assessment to excess profits tax by virtue of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 12, which provides :

"(1) Where the profits arising in any chargeable accounting period from any trade or business to which this section applies exceed the standard profits, there shall, subject to the provisions of this Part of this Act, be charged on the excess a tax (to be called the excess profits tax) equal to three-fifths of the excess. (2) Subject as hereafter provided, the trades and businesses to which this section applies are all trades or businesses of any description carried on in the United Kingdom, or carried on, whether personally or through an agent, by persons ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom."

By s. 14 it is provided :

"(1) For the purposes of this Part of this Act, the profits arising from a trade or business in the standard period or in any chargeable accounting period shall be separately computed, and shall be so computed on income tax principles as adapted in accordance with the provisions of Part I of sched. VII to this Act."

Part I of sched. VII to that Act contains in para. 6 the following provision :

"(1) Income received from investments shall be included in the profits in the cases and to the extent provided in sub-para. (2) of this paragraph and not otherwise."

It being conceded that the company concerned in the present appeal does not come within sub-para. (2), it follows that, if the profits in the present case are derived from investments, they would fall to be excluded from the assessment to excess profits tax.

The company was incorporated in 1903 and carries on the business of paper manufacturers at three mills, namely, the Aylesford Mills in Kent and two other mills. The present appeal is concerned solely with the Aylesford Mills. These premises cover 20 to 25 acres and comprise, inter alia, mills for the manufacture of paper, factories for the manufacture of cardboard boxes, and separate buildings, called stock rooms, which are used for the storage of manufactured goods. This appeal is concerned with two of those stock rooms. Stock room No. 4, which has an area of 42,000 sq. ft., was completed in June, 1937, at a cost of just over £12,000. Stock room No. 5, which has an area of 54,600 sq. ft. was built in three sections at a total cost exceeding £15,000. It appears from the Case Stated that at or shortly after the outbreak of war the Ministry of Supply took over all stocks of pulp, with the result that the manufacture of paper was restricted. In consequence of this restriction, the company found that for the present it did not require the use of stock rooms Nos. 4 and 5. Consequently, by a lease dated Sept. 20, 1940, the company let No. 4 stock room to Short Brothers, Ltd., until the expiration of the period three months after the date on which His Majesty should by Order in Council declare that the then present state of hostilities had ceased (determinable, however, as provided by cl. 5 of the lease) at a yearly rent of £2,250. Stock room No. 5 was requisitioned by the Admiralty on July 25, 1940, the company having informed the Admiralty that it was available if required. In respect of that requisition the Admiralty paid the company a compensation rent of £412 a year. I should have said that the first requisition was of one section of the No. 5 stock room. In the following year the Admiralty requisitioned the remaining sections of No. 5 stock room. It is conceded that for the purposes of this appeal no distinction is to be drawn between the letting of the one stock room and the requisition of the other. The Case finds that evidence was given, which was accepted by the commissioners, that both stock rooms in question were erected and equipped by the company solely for use by them as stock rooms in their business as paper manufacturers, that this purpose still subsists, and, as soon as the production of paper becomes normal and the buildings become available, the premises will revert to their normal use as stock rooms in the company's business.

The whole question involved in this appeal was whether or not the rent and compensation rent received by the company in respect of those stock rooms was derived from an investment within the meaning of the schedule. It was decided in Desoutter's case (1) that the word "investment" is not a word of art, but is to be interpreted in an ordinary business commonsense way as businessmen would deal with it. The commissioners in the present case, perhaps anticipating that decision, or, possibly, applying previous decisions relating to the old excess profits duty, have so interpreted the word. They say:

"In our opinion, up to the respective dates of the lease and requisition the buildings, though assets of the business, plainly were not investments in the business sense of that word."

So it is clear that they approached the question from the right angle, and the only question is whether or not there was evidence to support their conclusion. That is a pure question of fact and unless it can be said that there was no evidence to support their finding or unless it is manifest that they in some way dealt with the matter on a wrong principle or took into consideration matters which were irrelevant, this court cannot interfere with the finding of the commissioners.

It is said by counsel for the company that this case is to all intents and purposes indistinguishable from a case decided in this court, namely, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Broadway Car Co., Ltd. (2). Counsel says that the case is indistinguishable on its facts from that case and that the commissioners in the present case have misdirected themselves by considering that, because the letting was only a temporary one (as they described it), that was conclusive against the view that it could be an investment. Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Broadway Car Co., Ltd. (2) decided that there was evidence to justify the commissioners in arriving at the conclusion to which they had come in that case. That is all the case decided. It is true that on its facts the case is somewhat similar to the present case. A company was carrying on business as motor car agents and repairers, and they held land on lease from 1935 to 1956. The business of the company dwindled in 1940 to such an extent that they required no more than one-third of the land which they occupied and they sublet for 14 years out of a total of 16 years which there was to run, at an annual rent of £1,150, the remaining two-thirds of their property. It is quite true that a fact which did not appear in the ALL ENGLAND REPORTS, but did appear in the TAX LEAFLETS, was that there was a provision in that lease entitling the company to determine the sub-lease at the conclusion of the war. That fact is not mentioned in the judgments, and, in fact, SCOTT, L.J., says that the company had put it out of their power to resume business there ([1946] 2 All E.R. 610):

“War conditions had reduced the company’s business to very small proportions, and they cut their loss by going out of business in respect of the major part of their land and put it out of their power for 14 years to resume business there.”

That statement was not strictly accurate, but none the less the court clearly treated it as material that prima facie the company had parted with that portion of their premises for a very considerable period of time, although no doubt, they did have the power to change their minds at a subsequent date. It is clear that in that case there was no finding, as in the present, that the company wished and intended to resume possession of the property in question and use it for the purposes of their business at the earliest possible moment of time.

In my view, this is a pure question of fact, there was evidence to justify the finding at which the commissioners arrived in the present case, and it is one with which this court cannot interfere. What they said was this, and this is the language which was criticised:

“In our opinion, up to the respective dates of the lease and requisition the buildings, though assets of the business, plainly were not investments in the business sense of that word—the sense in which we think the word is used in para. 6. Nor, indeed, is the contrary alleged. The contention is that the execution of the lease in the one case, and the requisition by the Admiralty in the other, had the effect of creating investments, and not the less so because the lettings were temporary. As regards No. 4 stock room, in our opinion all that happened was that the company temporarily let to a third party, for a rent, a trading asset—not itself in the nature of an investment—the use of which was temporarily not required by the company, and we were unable to regard this temporary letting as creating an investment, in the business sense of that word. Nor do we think it makes any difference in principle that No. 5 stock room was not let, but requisitioned.”

I think that was a matter which they were entitled to take into consideration. I am not suggesting that that test would always be conclusive, but I think it is impossible to say that, in deciding a matter of this kind, the commissioners are not entitled to take into consideration that the letting is a temporary one. It is said that “temporary” is not a very apt description of this letting, having regard to the uncertainty prevailing with regard to the duration of the war in 1940, but I think those are all matters of fact to be dealt with by the commissioners and that there was material on which they could find that this was not an investment.

Before parting with the case, it is necessary for me to refer to the judgment of SINGLETON, J., because he came to the conclusion that the commissioners had misdirected themselves and that the question involved in the appeal was a question of law. He said:

A "The important element to be considered is the position at the time in question, not what had been the user before, nor what might be the user at some time thereafter. The finding [in the Case] goes on: 'In our opinion, up to the respective dates of the lease and requisition the buildings, though assets of the business, plainly were not investments in the business sense of that word—the sense in which we think the word is used in para. 6. Nor, indeed, is the contrary alleged. The contention is that the execution of the lease in the one case, and the requisition by the Admiralty in the other, had the effect of creating investments, and not the less so because the lettings were temporary.' Again I am not sure that that is the right way of approach. The effect of the lease was that that rent came about, rent was paid in respect of the occupation of one
B of the buildings—the building which was the subject-matter of the lease.
It was then for the Special Commissioners to determine whether that rent was income from an investment . . . Everyone agreed that there is no difference between the two cases in principle, but it is to be observed that the Special Commissioners attach importance to that which they C speak of as 'temporary letting.' If there was an income from an investment it does not seem to me that it matters for this purpose that it was only for a period—a short period or an indefinite period. The word
'therefore' [used by the commissioners in coming to their final decision] would appear to show that the commissioners are determining this question because of what they describe as the temporary nature of the letting and the fact that the buildings were erected for another purpose and might D at some time in the future be used for that purpose again. I do not think that this is the true way of approaching the question, and I do not say that in any sense by way of criticism. Everyone knows these questions are extraordinarily difficult and different persons may look at them in different ways, but it seems to me essential that what one should have regard to in a case of this kind is the user which was being made of those E premises at the time in question. They were let, and out of them and from them there came a rent. That rent was received by the company. Was it income from an investment? That is what has to be determined and, as I have said, I regard it not so much as a question of fact in this case, but rather a question as to the proper inference to be drawn from the documents and from the receipt of rent."

F Earlier in his judgment he had indicated the view that the matter before him was one of law and not of fact by quoting a passage from the speech of LORD SUMNER in the Gas Lighting Improvement Co. case (3). LORD SUMNER, in dealing with the word "investment" in the Act of 1915, which referred to excess profits duty, had said this (12 Tax Cas. 541):

G "My Lords, the Commissioners of Taxes held 'that the money employed in the foreign companies referred to was employed in the business of the company as capital and not as an investment within the meaning of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915.' This is a conclusion of law."

When one looks at that case, one finds in LORD SUMNER's speech that in his view the commissioners had applied the wrong test altogether. He says
H (ibid., 543):

"What, however, is the context in which the word ['investment'] is used here? The schedule prescribes rules for an operation closely akin to preparing a balance sheet of the assets and liabilities of a trading company. It does so for the purpose of ascertaining, sometimes the trading capital, sometimes its trading profits or gains. The provisions as to charging excess profits duty are only concerned with profits which are trading profits, and they are taxed with reference to a pre-war standard depending upon the one or the other. In such a connection why should an ordinary business term be used in any but its ordinary business sense ? ”

It is clear that the commissioners had not used the word in its ordinary business sense and therein lay their error. Furthermore, referring back to the opening paragraph of LORD SUMNER's speech, he goes on after the passage I have already cited (ibid., 541) :

“ The facts never were in dispute and they are fully set out in the Case. I think the evidence is all one way . . . ”

So, that case shows, first, that the commissioners had applied the wrong test. and, secondly, that there was no evidence to support their finding. That, of course, always involves a question of law. I do not think that that case really assists in the decision of the present appeal, which, to my mind, involves a pure question of fact, and I have formed a different view from that which was formed by SINGLETON, J., as to the approach of the Special Commissioners. Although they have to look at the matter at the moment of time with which they are concerned, I do not think that it can be said that they erred by looking at the past and the future in coming to a conclusion whether or not the lease had resulted in an investment. I think all the matters which they took into consideration were matters proper to be taken into consideration in enabling them to form their final judgment. For these reasons I think this appeal succeeds and the assessment upheld by the commissioners should be restored.

COHEN, L.J. : I am of the same opinion. As we are differing from the learned judge in the court below, I will state my reasons shortly. Counsel for the company argued that there is no material distinction between the facts of this case and those of the Broadway Car Co. case (2), and, therefore, he says, it necessarily follows that the commissioners in this case must have gone wrong in law. I am not sure whether that is a necessary consequence. To take the analogy of juries, I should have thought that, if two juries, properly directed, came to opposite conclusions on indistinguishable facts, this court might be unable to disturb either finding, unless, of course, the facts were such that one jury had no evidence to justify its verdict. I do not find it necessary to reach a conclusion on this submission since, in my opinion, the case before us is distinguishable from the Broadway Car Co. case (2) on the facts in the respect to which TUCKER, L.J., has referred. First, there is the distinction as to the length of the term. In the Broadway Car Co. case (2), the term was 14 years, subject, it is true, to a right to either party to determine the lease at the conclusion of hostilities, but it is plain from the last part of the judgment of SCOTT, L.J., that he, at any rate, thought that on the facts it was extremely unlikely that that power would be exercised. Secondly, there is the finding as to the intention of the parties and the purpose for which the building had been used and was to be used in the future. Those two findings of fact seem to me to make the two cases distinguishable. It is immaterial what conclusion I should myself have reached. The question I have to consider is whether there was evidence on which the commissioners could reach their conclusion. The point on which I differ from SINGLETON, J., is that, as I read his judgment, he thought that evidence as to the future user, after the conclusion of the year in question, was inadmissible. I am unable to accept that view. Although the profits of a particular year are being assessed, it seems to me that, in considering whether the rent of a portion of the business premises of the company is a yield from an investment or not, one is entitled to have regard to the question of the duration of the intended user. Counsel for the company had to admit, in answer to a question put by TUCKER, L.J., that, if the letting was for 14 days, it would be difficult to argue that there had been conversion from an operation of business premises into an investment. From that admission it would seem to follow that the matter is one of degree and it seems to me to be impossible to exclude evidence of the intention of the parties as to the user before and after the term. For these reasons I think, as I did in the Broadway Car Co. case (2), that the commissioners properly appreciated the principles of law which they should apply and that there was evidence on which they could reach the conclusion to which they came. I can see no ground on which we ought to interfere with their finding, and, therefore, I think that the appeal succeeds.

ASQUITH, L.J. : I also agree. The only principle of law applicable to the construction of the word "investment" appears to be that laid down in the Desoutter case (1) and in the Broadway Car Co. case (2)—that it must be taken to mean what an ordinary business man would understand by the word. Can the conclusion of the commissioners be challenged? It seems to me that it can only be challenged in one or other of two events. First, if, the business man's criterion having been properly applied, the lease in question could not possibly have been described as an "investment." (That is the equivalent of saying, if there was no evidence on which the commissioners could have found that it was an investment). Secondly, if the commissioners, while professing to apply the businessman's criterion, had, in fact, applied some different criterion which they thought to be binding on them in law. If, for instance, after recording the undoubted fact that these stock rooms were originally a trading asset of the company and no more, they had gone on to say that this fact in itself precluded them in law from deciding that subsequent leases were investments, they would have gone wrong in law. Counsel for the company urged that, in effect, this was exactly what they had done, with the difference that they had treated, not a single factor, but two factors—first, the original character of the stock rooms as trading assets, and, secondly, the brevity of the term of the letting—as conclusive in law against an investment resulting. I do not think the commissioners have done this. What the Case Stated seems to me to do is, first, to record, as a matter of history, that the stock rooms started life as a trading asset, and, then to go on to enquire whether that trading asset later acquired the character of an investment in the business sense of the word. They nowhere say that a trading asset cannot become an investment. By implication they admit that it may become so by being let, if the term of the lease is sufficiently long, but they find that, owing to the temporary character of the lease, the brevity of the term, no investment results. Once the proper standard was applied, as, in fact, it was, to the question whether there was an investment or not, the question seems to be one of fact and degree on which the commissioners' findings are irreversible. I agree that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors : Solicitor of Inland Revenue ; Biddle, Thorne, Welsford & Barnes (for the company).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

BUCKLAND v. GUILDFORD GAS LIGHT AND COKE CO.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Morris, J.), October 21, 22, 25, November 25, 1948.]

Negligence—Child—High-voltage electric overhead wires—Easily climbed tree immediately below wires—Child electrocuted while climbing tree—Liability of electricity undertakers.

The defendants, electricity undertakers, provided electric current for a district by means of overhead high-voltage wires carried on poles. The wires passed over a field which was rented by a farmer and over which there was an unfenced footpath leading to the farm. About 90 yds. from the footpath and immediately under the wires was a large oak tree, the top of which had been cut away to permit the passage of the wires. The tree was easy to climb owing to a long branch hanging near to the ground, but there was no danger notice on or near it and no anti-climbing devices fixed to it. On June 21, 1947, a girl aged 13, who was staying at a schoolchildren's camp near by, climbed the tree and was electrocuted. Owing to the density of the foliage at the time, the wires could not easily be seen from under the tree. Children from the camp were allowed to visit the farm by arrangement, but no general permission had been given to them to use the field and at the time of the accident the girl was not taking part in any arranged visit to the farm. The plaintiff, the father of the girl, contended that the defendants were guilty of negligence in that (a) having placed something dangerous on another person's land, they had failed to take steps to protect persons who might be on the land from dangers which might reasonably be anticipated, and (b) they should not have permitted live wires to pass close to a climbable tree which constituted an attraction to children. The defendants contended (a) that the girl was a trespasser, and, therefore, they owed no duty to her, as their duty to her was no higher than that of the owner of the land, who would be under no liability to a tree-climbing trespasser, and (b) the girl was guilty of contributory negligence. The court held that contributory negligence had not been established.

HELD : (i) the defendants owed a duty to take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which they could reasonably foresee would be likely to injure a person so closely and directly affected by their acts or omissions that the defendants ought to have had such a person in contemplation as being so affected (dictum of LORD ATKIN in Donoghue v. Stevenson ([1932] A.C. 580 ; 147 L.T. 285) applied) ; they should have known that it was dangerous to have high-voltage wires immediately above a tree which could be easily climbed and the foliage of which was so dense that the presence of the wires could not easily be seen ; and, therefore, as the deceased girl was a person whom the defendants ought to have had in contemplation as being directly affected by their failure to take proper precautions, they were guilty of breach of duty amounting to negligence.

Bourhill v. Young ([1942] 2 All E.R. 396 ; [1943] A.C. 92 ; 167 L.T. 261), considered.

(ii) the girl was not a trespasser vis-a-vis the defendants and the defendants had not proved that she was a trespasser vis-a-vis the occupier of the land, but, assuming that she was a trespasser on the land, the defendants' liability was on a different basis from that of the occupier as it arose from the duty to take reasonable care while maintaining highly dangerous overhead wires, and, therefore, as the girl's action in climbing the tree was one that should have been reasonably foreseen, she was a person to whom the defendants owed a duty to take all reasonable steps to prevent the existence of a hidden peril.

[AS TO ALLUREMENT OF CHILDREN, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 584-586, para. 836; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 36, pp. 68-71, Nos. 433-462.]

Cases referred to :

- A (1) Hay (or Bourhill) v. Young, [1942] 2 All E.R. 396; [1943] A.C. 92; 111 L.J.P.C. 97; 167 L.T. 261; 2nd Digest Supp.
- ✓ (2) M'Alister (or Donoghue) v. Stevenson, [1932] A.C. 562; 101 L.J.P.C. 119; 147 L.T. 281; Digest Supp.
- ✓ (3) Heaven v. Pender, (1883), 11 Q.B.D. 503; 52 L.J.Q.B. 702; 49 L.T. 357; 47 J.P. 709; 36 Digest 8, 9.
- B (4) Hardy v. Central London Ry. Co., [1920] 3 K.B. 459; 89 L.J.K.B. 1187; 124 L.T. 136; 36 Digest 71, 457.
- ✓ (5) Latham v. Johnson (R.) & Nephew, Ltd., [1913] 1 K.B. 398; 82 L.J.K.B. 258; 108 L.T. 4; 77 J.P. 137; 36 Digest 38, 223.
- ✓ (6) Addie (R.) & Sons (Collieries) v. Dumbreck, [1929] A.C. 358; 98 L.J.P.C. 119; 140 L.T. 650; Digest Supp.
- C (7) Adams v. Naylor, [1944] 2 All E.R. 21; [1944] K.B. 750; 113 L.J.K.B. 499; 171 L.T. 105; on appeal, [1946] 2 All E.R. 241; [1946] A.C. 543; 115 L.J.K.B. 356; 175 L.T. 97; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (8) Excelsior Wire Rope Co., Ltd. v. Callan, [1930] A.C. 404; 99 L.J.K.B. 380; 142 L.T. 531; 94 J.P. 174; Digest Supp.
- D ✓ (9) Mourton v. Poulter, [1930] 2 K.B. 183; 99 L.J.K.B. 289; 143 L.T. 20; sub nom. Moulton v. Poulter, 94 J.P. 190; Digest Supp.
- (10) Kimber v. Gas Light & Coke Co., [1918] 1 K.B. 439; 87 L.J.K.B. 651; 118 L.T. 562; 82 J.P. 125; 36 Digest 18, 83.
- (11) Brown v. Cotterill, (1934), 51 T.L.R. 21; Digest Supp.
- (12) Haseldine v. Daw & Son, Ltd., [1941] 3 All E.R. 156; [1941] 2 K.B. 343; 111 L.J.K.B. 45; 165 L.T. 185; 2nd Digest Supp.
- E (13) Barnes v. Irwell Valley Water Board, [1938] 2 All E.R. 650; [1939] 1 K.B. 21; 107 L.J.K.B. 629; 159 L.T. 125; 102 J.P. 373; Digest Supp.
- (14) Liddle v. North Riding of Yorkshire County Council, [1934] 2 K.B. 101; 103 L.J.K.B. 527; 151 L.T. 202; 98 J.P. 319; Digest Supp.
- (15) United Zinc and Chemical Co. v. van Britt, (1922), U.S. 268.

F ACTION for damages on the ground of negligence.

The action was brought under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, by the father of a girl, aged 13, who was killed on June 21, 1947, by coming into contact with a live electric cable which was used by the defendants, an electricity company, to carry their electric current to a district supplied by them. The cable passed immediately above a large and easily climbable tree, standing in a field, about 90 yds. from a footpath leading to a farm. The girl, who was staying at a schoolchildren's camp in the neighbourhood, climbed to the top of the tree and was electrocuted. The defendants contended (a) that they owed no duty to the girl as she was a trespasser in the field, and (b) that she was guilty of contributory negligence. MORRIS, J., held that the defendants owed a duty to the girl and were liable for damages for negligence and he negatived contributory negligence. The facts appear in the judgment.

Astell Burt for the plaintiff.

Melford Stevenson, K.C., and J. Harcourt Barrington for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25. MORRIS, J. : On June 21, 1947, a daughter of the plaintiff, by name Iris May Buckland, who was 13 years of age, met her death in circumstances which the plaintiff alleges render the defendants liable in law. The plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of his late daughter, claims damages for loss of expectation of life, and, furthermore, on his own and his wife's behalf he claims damages pursuant to the provisions of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846. On the date mentioned the defendants provided electric current for the district of Surrey, which included Ewhurst. They had caused poles to be erected which carried overhead wires charged with electric current of 11,000 volts, and they maintained the system of supply which required those wires. A copy of a section of the ordnance survey map shows the location of a farm known as Coneyhurst Farm and the line of a footpath from the farm passing over a field, No. 298, and leading to a road shown on the right-hand side of the map. That road, if continued for about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles in a southerly or south-easterly direction, leads to a camp known as Sayers Croft Camp which was under the control of the London County Council and was attended by school children from within the London area. The deceased girl had been staying at the camp during the week preceding her death. The overhead wires of the defendants were carried over the field No. 298 in a north-easterly direction over a scrub hedge in the line of which there were several trees. The plan further shows the position of a tree stump immediately under the electric wires. The tree, of which only the stump now remains, was standing at the time of the death of the deceased girl. This tree was an oak which was easy to climb as there was a long branch which hung down towards the ground. Apart from this branch there were no others within about 9 ft. of the ground. In June, 1947, the foliage of the tree was very thick. The electric wires passed over the tree, but the density of the foliage towards the top of the tree was such that the cables could not readily be seen. They would only be discerned by some one who looked very keenly or was aware of their presence and looked specially for them. The tree was about 90 yds. from the footpath leading to the farm. The footpath was not fenced.

Coneyhurst Farm was visited two or three times a week by parties of children from Sayers Croft Camp. By arrangement they went to see milking being done. If it was fine, they used the footpath; if wet, they used the route by road. Field No. 298 is not part of Coneyhurst Farm, but was rented by the farm for use for grazing in the summer. The resident bailiff employed at Coneyhurst Farm had not given any general permission for children to use field No. 298. There were, in all, four overhead wires, and three of those were live with current. Relative to each other they were held in diamond-like formation. At approximately a height of 18 ft. 7 ins. from the ground was the non-live or earth wire. At a level approximately 2 ft. 6 ins. higher were two parallel live wires. At a level of approximately a further 2 ft. 6 ins. higher was the fourth of the wires, which was live. The line of wires was erected in about 1932. The work was done by contractors employed by the defendants. The top of the tree to which I have been referring was then cut away so as to permit of the passage of the wires. Consideration was given at the time to the question of removing the tree. The defendants' engineer, Mr. Nunnerley, stated in his evidence that he believed that there was some correspondence at the time between the consulting engineer and the owner of the land in relation to this matter, and he thought that the owner would not consent to the cutting down of the tree.

The Electricity (Supply) Act, 1926, s. 34, (1) provides :

"Where any tree or hedge obstructs or interferes with the construction, maintenance, or working of any main transmission line or other electric line which is being constructed or is owned by any authorised undertakers, or will interfere with the maintenance or working of such a line, the authorised undertakers may give notice to the owner or occupier of the land on which the tree or hedge is growing requiring him to lop or cut it so as to prevent the obstruction or interference, subject to the payment to him by the authorised undertakers of the expenses reasonably incurred by him in complying with the notice."

Section 34 (6) provides :

"Where for the purpose of the construction or maintenance of a transmission line it is necessary to fell any trees, this section shall apply to the felling of trees in like manner as it applies to the lopping of trees."

A copy of an agreement dated Jan. 7, 1933, and made between the defendants and the owner of the land, was by agreement put before the court. Under the terms of this agreement the defendants undertook to maintain the overhead wires and installations in good repair and condition and so as not to be a danger to the owner or to his lessees or tenants or to his or their property or employees, and also that in certain circumstances they would indemnify the owner and his tenants or occupiers against losses or damages or expenses which they might suffer by reason of any wrongful act, negligence or omission on the part of the defendants. There was no danger notice on or near the tree, and there were no anti-climbing devices fixed to it. It was the practice of the defendants to send a linesman in their employ twice a year to follow the route of the wires for inspection purposes. If, as a result of such inspection, a cutting away of foliage growing near to the wires was considered necessary, such work would be, or ought to be, done. Interference with current transmission and temporary dislocation of some current supplies might result if foliage or the branches of a tree became in contact with conductor wires. Mr. Nunnerley thought that the linesman's last visit before June, 1947, would have been in about February, 1947. The linesman who made that visit is not now in the employment of the defendants, and he was not called as a witness.

On the afternoon of Saturday, June 21, 1947, Mr. Morrow, the resident farm bailiff to Coneyhurst Farm, was called to field No. 298 by some girls from Sayers Croft Camp. They led him to the tree. Looking up he saw a young girl motionless near the top. He called to her, but received no reply. Then, as he moved near to the bottom of the tree, he saw the severed head of the girl lying on the ground. The police were informed and after the current had been cut off a police officer using a ladder went to the body of the girl, who was Iris May Buckland. The density of the foliage made it difficult for him to reach her. He had to use a saw to cut his way through. The headless body of the child was in a sitting position with feet hanging downwards, leaning backwards near to the bottom or earth wire and supported by boughs and foliage which seemed to represent more than the growth of a few preceding months. Some of the girl's hair was adherent to one of the live or conductor wires. The conclusion which, I think, it is reasonable to draw from the evidence is that the girl climbed the tree without realising that she was heading towards live electric wires, and that she came into contact with them and was instantly killed. The girl was not taking part in any arranged visit to the farm.

On behalf of the plaintiff it was submitted that, having placed something of danger on the land of another, the defendants were under a duty to take steps to protect persons who might be on the land from dangers which could reasonably be anticipated. It was further contended that a climbable tree constitutes an attraction to children and that the defendants were under a duty not to permit live wires to pass so close to or above such a tree that one climbing the tree would or might come in contact with the live wires. On behalf of the defendants it was submitted that the girl was a trespasser, that the defendants owed no higher duty to her than would be owed by an occupier of land towards a trespasser, and that in the circumstances an occupier would have been under no liability to a tree-climbing trespasser. Further, it was said that the girl was guilty of contributory negligence. Also, it was urged that nothing done by the defendants caused the existence of any allurements attractive to a child and that the defendants had no reason to anticipate that the girl would trespass, or, whether a trespasser or not, would climb the tree.

In the presentation of the careful and helpful arguments reference was made to many authorities. On the view which I have formed on the evidence it cannot be said that the girl committed any act of trespass in regard to any part of the installation of the defendants. It seems reasonable to conclude that she was unaware that, as she climbed, she was nearing death-dealing wires. There was some evidence that she was not knowledgeable about the nature of and the dangers of live overhead wires, and it is a possible view that, as she climbed, she thought she might pass through the foliage and then be somewhere near to overhead wires, which she may have deduced would be above the trees, but the danger of which she did not realise. This does not, however, seem to me to be the correct view, and, in my judgment, the girl was not a trespasser vis-a-vis the defendants. It is said, however, that the conclusion ought to be drawn that she was trespassing on the land, and the evidence of the farm bailiff that he did not give permission for the girls to stray from the path, is put forward as the foundation on which to base the suggested conclusion. In a case in which a plaintiff is suing the occupier of land, it must, as a rule, be for the plaintiff, as part of the proof of facts showing the existence of some particular duty, to show how he or she came to be on the land, but in the present case it is the defendants who are asserting that vis-a-vis the occupier of the land the girl, was a trespasser. The owner or occupier of the land has not said so. It may be that the owner or occupier did give permission, or it may be that the arrangements made in regard to farm visits had inherent in them a permission to children from the camp, even if not making one of the planned visits, to wander over the fields of the farm during a Saturday afternoon stroll. If the defendants wish to maintain that the girl was trespassing on field No. 298, they must prove it. The evidence of the farm bailiff falls short of such proof.

It becomes necessary to consider whether the defendants had any, and if so what, duty to the child, and, if they did owe a duty to her, whether they were in breach of it, with the result that the death of the child was caused. In approaching these problems it is necessary to take account of all the relevant features and circumstances surrounding the occurrence now being investigated. As LORD PORTER said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 409) in his speech in Bourhill v. Young (1):

"In the case of a civil action there is no such thing as negligence in the abstract: there must be neglect of the use of care towards a person towards whom the defendant owes the duty of observing care. And I am content to take the statement of LORD ATKIN in Donoghue v. Stevenson (2) ([1932] A.C. 580) as indicating the extent of the duty: 'You must take reasonable care to avoid acts and omissions which you can reasonably foresee would be likely to injure your neighbour. Who, then, in law is my neighbour? The answer seems to be—persons who are so closely and directly affected by my act that I ought reasonably to have them in contemplation as being so affected when I am directing my mind to the acts or omissions which are called in question'."

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 401):

"In considering whether a person owes to another a duty a breach of which will render him liable to that other in damages for negligence, it is material to consider what the defendant ought to have contemplated as a reasonable man. This consideration may play a double role. It is relevant in cases of admitted negligence (where the duty and breach are admitted) to the question of remoteness of damages, i.e., to the question of compensation not to culpability; but it is also relevant in testing the existence of a duty as the foundation of the alleged negligence, i.e., to the question of culpability not to that of compensation."

LORD RUSSELL then quoted from the judgment of BRETT, M.R. (11 Q.B.D. 509) in Heaven v. Pender (3):

" . . . whenever one person is by circumstances placed in such a position with regard to another that every one of ordinary sense who did think would at once recognise that if he did not use ordinary care and skill in his own conduct with regard to those circumstances he would cause danger of injury to the person or property of the other, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill to avoid such danger."

After quoting from LORD ATKIN's speech ([1932] A.C. 580) in Donoghue v. Stevenson (2), LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN continued ([1942] 2 All E.R. 401):

"A man is not liable for negligence in the air; the liability only arises 'where there is a duty to take care and where failure in that duty has caused damage'."

LORD MACMILLAN said (ibid., 403):

"There is no absolute standard of what is reasonable and probable. It must depend on circumstances and must always be a question of degree."

LORD WRIGHT said (ibid., 406):

"It is here, as elsewhere, a question of what the hypothetical reasonable man, viewing the position, I suppose ex post facto, would say it was proper to foresee."

In applying the tests indicated by the passages to which I have referred, it is proper, in my judgment, to have in mind the nature of the particular peril which is a reasonably foreseeable possibility. The defendants knew that the wires they maintained were so charged that instant death would probably be caused to anyone who came in contact with them. The regulations imposing obligations on the defendants to fix anti-climbing devices and warning notices to any poles or structures carrying wires served as an additional reminder of the need to take steps to avert any possible perils attendant on the transmission of high-voltage along wires carried overhead across the countryside. Reminder of such nature would, however, in the case of the defendants be superfluous. If underneath the wires there existed some object that reached up towards the wires, it would require no undue prescience to observe that, if the object could be climbed, then a path to peril might lie open. If, additionally, the wires—and, therefore, the peril—were hidden, the dangers of the situation would be all the greater. Endeavouring to apply reasonable standards, and not seeking to require any unique gifts of pre-vision, I consider that the defendants ought to have known that it was dangerous to have their high-voltage wires immediately above a tree which could easily be climbed and whose foliage was so dense that the presence of the wires above could not readily be seen. The fact that the tree was about 90 yds. from a footpath is merely a particular additional feature of the circumstances. Applying the words of LORD ATKIN ([1932] A.C. 580) in Donoghue v. Stevenson (2), the defendants owed a duty to take reasonable care to avoid acts or omissions which they could reasonably foresee would be likely to injure a person so closely and directly affected by their acts or omissions that the defendants ought reasonably to have had such a person in contemplation as being so affected. It required no vivid imagination on the part of anyone traversing the route of the wires to appreciate the great peril of having the wires above a tree that could be easily climbed, and whose foliage, being dense in the month of June would obscure the wires. If any one did climb the tree, he would with every step approach a hidden peril of the direst kind. The facts of the present case show all too dramatically the nature of the peril. It was, in my judgment, easily foreseeable that some one might climb the tree and so might become in close proximity to an unseen deadly peril. The tree might have been felled when the wires were being erected. The tree was, in fact, cut down on some date after June 21, 1947. This, however, is not a circumstance that of itself involves any inherent admission of the prior necessity for cutting down, and it would be wrong so to regard it. The tree not having in the first instance been felled, it is manifest that many later steps could have been taken which would have prevented the happening of the fatality.

The deceased girl was, in my judgment, within the group of those whom the defendants ought to have had in contemplation. She was a "neighbour" in the sense in which that word was used by LORD ATKIN in what LORD WRIGHT [in Bourhill v. Young (1) ([1942] 2 All E.R. 404)] called his "well-known aphorism . . . in Donoghue v. Stevenson" (2). I have given my reasons for concluding that she must not be regarded as having been a trespasser in field No. 298. It has not been proved to me that she was, but, even if, contrary to my view on the evidence before me, the inference ought to be drawn that she was not permitted to be, but was a trespasser when she was, by the tree, she was nevertheless in the circumstances of this case one to whom, in my judgment, the defendants owed a duty. The classifications into which persons may fall according to whether, in relation to the occupier of the land, they are his invitees or his licensees or whether they are trespassing, do not have decisive significance when considering in the present circumstances the position of the defendants. The occupier of field No. 298 might owe different duties to those who were his invitees from those which he owed to those who were his licensees. The duties owed by the defendants to those in the two classes would be the same. If some one trespassed on field No. 298, the duties owed to him by the occupier would be most limited: see Hardy v. Central London Railway Co. (4), Latham v. Johnson (5) and Addie v. Dumbreck (6). In considering whether the defendants had a duty to such a trespasser, the fact that vis-a-vis the occupier of the land the person was a trespasser would be a very relevant circumstance to have in mind, but it would not in all cases be a conclusive one. Broadly speaking, those whose presence the defendants ought to contemplate would, doubtless, be persons who were lawfully present on the land. Under most conditions the defendants would be entitled to assume that persons would not go unlawfully on land, and the defendants would not be under an obligation to provide against the contingency of persons trespassing. Though not occupiers of the land, the defendants are in a position closely analogous.

The group of those who must be regarded as "neighbours" from the point of view of the defendants is, however, not of rigid necessity the same as the group of those who must be regarded as invitees or licensees from the point of view of the occupier of the land. The test to be applied in considering who is a neighbour is the test indicated by LORD ATKIN in Donoghue v. Stevenson (2). As a general rule, a trespasser on land would not be within the group of neighbours, but whether some particular person is a neighbour depends on the circumstances of a particular case. I am, of course, dealing only with the one before me. If it were the fact that the deceased girl wandered 90 yds. from the footpath without permission and had no actual permission to be on the land under the tree or to climb the tree, I would still, in the circumstances of this case, have regarded the child as being one whom the defendants ought reasonably to have had in contemplation, and, further, that her action in climbing the tree was one which they ought reasonably to have foreseen. A tree visible from a nearby footpath which may be easily climbed may, to the gaze of a bright and healthy schoolgirl, present an alluring attraction which would not suggest itself to those who are either no longer nimble or for whom heights have no fascination.

The cases dealing with what MORTON, J., in the Court of Appeal in Adams v. Naylor (7) called ([1944] 2 All E.R. 30) the "unenviable position of a trespasser at common law" are, in my judgment, not directly in point. Nor are the cases like Excelsior Wire Rope Co., Ltd. v. Callan (8) or Mourton v. Poulter (9), where the plaintiffs recovered even though they had been trespassing. Liability in those two cases resulted from the fact that some dangerous act was done with reckless disregard of the presence of the trespassing children. It was, however, forcibly contended that, in as much as the occupier of land is not, save on the basis to which I have just referred, liable if a trespassing child meets with injury, the liability of some one in the position of the defendants ought to be no greater. In my judgment, this does not necessarily follow. The liability, if any, of an occupier of land arises out of the fact of his occupancy and of some action of his while occupying. The extent of the liability towards children was fully stated by LORD HAILSHAM, L.C., in his speech in Addie v. Dumbreck (6) ([1929] A.C. 364, 365): see also the discussion of the law in WINFIELD ON TORTS, 2nd ed., p. 626, et seq. But the liability, if any, of the defendants is on a somewhat different basis. It arises because of a duty to take reasonable care while maintaining highly dangerous overhead wires. If the daughter of the occupier of field No. 298 had done as the deceased girl did, then, on the facts as I have found them, the defendants would be liable, but reasonable forethought on the part of the defendants would have extended to cover, not only the daughter of the occupier of the land, but also invited playmates of the daughter, and, possibly, some others, such as the deceased girl in the circumstances of the present case.

It may be useful to mention certain cases which have been decided in different circumstances. In Kimber v. Gas Light and Coke Co. (10), the rewas no suggestion that the plaintiff was a trespasser, and SCRUTTON, L.J., spoke ([1918] 1 K.B. 447) of the duty of a person doing work on private premises " . . . to carry on his work with due precautions for the safety of those whom he knows, or ought reasonably to know, may be lawfully in the vicinity of his work . . . "

So, in Brown v. Cotterill (11), where a monumental mason was held liable for injuries to a child on whom fell a tombstone negligently fitted by the mason, the child was lawfully in the graveyard and LAWRENCE, J., said (51 T.L.R. 22):

" These facts appear to me to create a duty in the defendants to every member of the public who might lawfully enter the churchyard and be injured by the fall of the tombstone. "

So, the injured plaintiff who recovered damages in Haseldine v. Daw (12) against the repairer of the lift was one lawfully on the premises. In that case, SCOTT, L.J., said ([1941] 3 All E.R. 174):

" The facts of this case, therefore, in my opinion, clearly show that [the engineers] did owe a duty of care to any person using the lift in the ordinary way up to the time of their next examination of it . . . "

GODDARD, L.J., said (ibid., 185):

" It follows that, where the facts show that no intermediate inspection is practicable or is contemplated, a repairer of a chattel stands in no different position from that of a manufacturer, and does owe a duty to a person who, in the ordinary course, may be expected to make use of the thing repaired. "

So, also, the plaintiffs in Barnes v. Irwell Valley Water Board (13) were lawfully on the premises. But would a duty to take reasonable care to supply power and wholesome water not exist towards the wife of one who wrongly continued to occupy a house at the end of a lease? Or, if a person entered particular premises by mistake, and, having taken the lift, was injured in circumstances rendering a negligent repairer liable to persons entitled to use the lift, would the repairer be exempt from responsibility to the injured person? Or, would a companion of the appellants Donoghue who, in the cafe at Paisley, had without her permission picked up her tumbler and drunk out of it and become ill have been without remedy against the respondent Stevenson? In my judgment, each of these questions and each set of facts would require separate examination, but liability such as that being considered in this case would not rigidly, automatically and inevitably be excluded merely because an injured person was one towards whom the occupier of the land would owe no greater duties than those very limited ones that he would owe towards a trespasser.

If the matter had to be looked at on the assumption that it was the occupier of the land who was maintaining the overhead wires and had the responsibility for their positions, their height and their supervision, then, on such basis and on the facts as I have found them, but assuming no express invitation to a child to leave the footpath, there might nevertheless be liability for an accident. In Liddle v. North Riding of Yorkshire County Council (14), where the Court of Appeal dealt fully with the law in regard to infant trespassers, SCRUTTON, L.J., referred to the decision of HOLMES, J., in a case in the Supreme Court of the United States. SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1934] 2 K.B. 109) :

"HOLMES, J., whose views on English as well as on American law are entitled to the most respectful consideration, has said in United Zinc and Chemical Co. v. van Britt (15) 'Infants have no greater right to go upon other people's land than adults, and the mere fact that they are infants imposes no duty upon landowners to expect them and to prepare for their safety. On the other hand the duty of one who invites another upon his land not to lead him into a trap is well settled, and while it is very plain that temptation is not invitation, it may be held that knowingly to establish and expose, unfenced, to children of an age when they follow a bait as mechanically as a fish, something that is certain to attract them, has the legal effect of an invitation to them although not to an adult. But the principle if accepted must be very cautiously applied.'"

If, then, the position of an occupier of land who maintained overhead wires were being considered, there would arise the question whether there was the legal effect of an invitation to children in a case where a tree which is easy to climb is within 90 yds. of a footpath. A fair way to test the argument now being considered is to assume that the defendants were the owners and occupiers of field No. 298 and to assume that the deceased girl had no actual permission to leave the footpath or to be on any of the nearby fields. On that footing, with cautious approach it would have to be considered whether the exposing, unfenced and unprotected, of a tempting, climbable tree did not have the legal effect of an invitation to a child. On the view of the case which I am expressing, I am not called on to decide this. It is sufficient to point out that, even if it were thought that the defendants could not be in any different position from that which they would be in if they both maintained the wires and occupied the land under them, it does not by any means follow that on the latter hypothesis they might not be liable. The defendants are, however, in a different position from the occupier of the land. They do not know, save to the extent that knowledge may come to them in the course of periodical inspections of their system, how much traversed the land may be. They do not know how much the occupier or members of his family or his friends use the land. They do not know the extent to which the occupier may give permission to people to be on the land. They have no control over any of these matters, and they cannot limit or restrict the number of those who, either with or without permission, may be on the land at the foot of the tree which is in question. If the occupier of the land invited people to go on to the land for some purpose and made a charge to them for admission, he might owe a higher duty to such persons than to others who came on the land as invitees. He would owe a lesser duty to licensees than he would owe to invitees, but the defendants would not be affected by these considerations. It would not appear to be reasonable if the duty owed by the defendants depended for its existence on the particular relationship (of which the defendants would be ignorant) existing between persons on the land and the occupier, or if that duty varied in quality according to that relationship.

For the reasons which I have assigned I consider that the defendants, in the circumstances which existed, owed a duty to the deceased girl to take all reasonable steps to prevent the existence of a hidden peril. The defendants could easily have taken various steps which would have avoided the grave risks of lurking, unseen danger. By breach of duty amounting to negligence they are, in my judgment, liable for the event which happened. I do not consider that contributory negligence on the part of the deceased girl is established. It was said that, being a bright, intelligent girl, aged 13, who was, as the evidence showed, competent to look after a younger child aged 8, she ought to have realised that she was approaching overhead wires. It was submitted that she could and should have seen that there were overhead wires and that they went towards the hedge where the tree was, and that, accordingly, she ought to have deduced when at the foot of the tree that the wires would be overhead and to have remembered their direction of approach, but a possible failure to recall the existence of the wires or a failure to make a correct deduction ought not, in the case of a girl of 13, to be held to be negligence. If she saw the wires and thought that she could climb up to them by going up the tree, in that event she might have regarded them as being telephone wires or some wires of a harmless character. There was no notice on or near the tree conveying a warning that, concealed above the foliage, there were wires which would kill at a touch. If, as seems more probable, she did not remember when she was under the tree that she had previously seen wires going towards the direction of the tree, this ought not to be imputed to her as negligence. Contributory negligence is not made out.

[His LORDSHIP then assessed the damages to the plaintiff's daughter's estate, under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, as £300, and awarded £200 under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, with £19 for funeral expenses.]

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Solicitors: J. R. Cort Bathurst (for the plaintiff); Blount, Petre & Co. (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

[Reversed. H.L. [1950] 2 All E.R. 314.

ATKINSON (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. GOODLASS WALL AND LEAD INDUSTRIES, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Tucker, Cohen and Asquith, L.JJ.), November 18, 19, 26, 1948.]

Income Tax—Income from foreign possessions—New source in year of assessment—Shares in foreign company—Acquired prior to 1942-43—Income first received in 1942-43—Finance Act, 1926 (c. 22), s. 30, proviso (ii).

By s. 30 of the Finance Act, 1926: "All profits or income in respect of which any person is chargeable . . . under . . . Case V of sched. D may respectively be assessed and charged in one sum: Provided that . . . (ii) If in any year of assessment any person acquires a new source of any such profits or income or an addition to any source of any such profits or income, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source or from the addition to that source shall be computed separately . . . and in the case of profits or income chargeable under . . . Case V of sched. D the provisions of proviso (b) to sub-s. (1) of the last preceding section of this Act shall apply." By s. 29 (1), proviso (b): "(i) income tax shall be computed, as respects the year of assessment in which the income first arises, on the full amount of the income arising within that year."

Before the income tax year 1942-43 the taxpayers acquired shares in an Argentine company. For some years they had also owned shares in other foreign companies producing dividends and had been assessed to income tax under sched. D, Case V, in respect of the income from such other shares on the preceding year's basis without differentiating between the items making up their foreign possessions in accordance with s. 30 of the Finance Act, 1926. In January, 1943, the taxpayers for the first time received a dividend on their shares in the Argentine company, in respect of which an assessment was made for the year 1942-43. The taxpayers contended that this dividend should not be treated separately from their other income arising from foreign possessions, but should be treated as part of such income arising in the year 1942-43, and, accordingly, assessable in the following year.

HELD: the words "if in any year of assessment" in s. 30, proviso (ii), of the Finance Act, 1926, were not confined to the year of assessment in which the income first arose, but meant "if at any time," and, therefore, the taxpayers had acquired a new source of income within the meaning of proviso (ii) to s. 30, so that income tax was to be computed in respect of the year 1942-43 in accordance with the Finance Act, 1926, s. 29 (1) proviso (b) (i) on the full amount of the income arising within that year.

Decision of SINGLETON, J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 653), reversed.

[FOR THE FINANCE ACT, 1926, s. 30, proviso (ii), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 9, p. 670.]

Case referred to :

- (1) Diggines v. Forestal Land, Timber & Railways Co., [1931] A.C. 380 ; 100 L.J.K.B. 145 ; 144 L.T. 514 ; 15 Tax Cas. 630 ; Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the Crown from a decision of SINGLETON, J., dated July 8, 1948, ([1948] 2 All E.R. 653) on a Case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax. The assessment had been discharged both by the Special Commissioners and the learned judge. The Court of Appeal restored the assessment.

Millard Tucker, K.C., J. H. Stamp and R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Donovan, K.C. and Graham-Dixon for the taxpayers.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26. COHEN, L.J., read the following judgment. This is an appeal from an order of SINGLETON, J., dated July 8, 1948, whereby he affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners who had discharged an additional assessment of £7,434 made on the taxpayers for the year ending Apr. 5, 1943.

The facts which gave rise to this assessment are as follows. The taxpayers owned the whole of the issued capital of an Argentine company, Goodlass Wall y Cie, having acquired that capital over a series of years ending with 1936. No dividend was declared on those shares until January, 1943. The taxpayers, however, owned shares in other foreign companies in the income tax year 1942-43 and in the preceding year and had been assessed to income tax thereon. At the time the assessment for the year 1942-43 was made the inspector was unaware of the receipt of the dividend on the shares in Goodlass Wall y Cie. When he heard of it, he made an additional assessment under the power conferred by the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 125, to cover the sterling equivalent of that dividend. It is the validity of this assessment which is now in question.

The Crown contend that the income in question was chargeable under the Rules Applicable to Case V of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, which relates to tax in respect of income from possessions out of the United Kingdom.

A The original r. 1 dealt with tax in respect of stocks, shares and rents in any place outside the United Kingdom, and the original r. 2 dealt with tax in respect of income arising from possessions out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares and rents. The division into categories was altered by the Finance Act, 1940, s. 19, and rr. 1 and 2, which I will read, are now as follows :

B “The tax in respect of income arising from possessions out of the United Kingdom other than income which—(a) is immediately derived by a person from the carrying on by him of any trade, profession or vocation either solely or in partnership; or (b) arises from any office, employment or pension, shall be computed on the full amount thereof on an average of the three preceding years, as directed in Case I, whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom or not, subject, in the case of income not received in the United Kingdom, to the same deductions and allowances as are provided in r. 1 of the Rules applicable to Case IV, and the provisions of this Act, including those relating to the delivery of statements, shall apply accordingly.”

Rule 2 :

D “The tax in respect of income arising from possessions out of the United Kingdom, other than income to which r. 1 applies, shall be computed on the full amount of the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom from remittances payable in the United Kingdom, or from property imported, or from money or value arising from property not imported, or from money or value so received on credit or on account in respect of E any such remittances, property, money, or value brought or to be brought into the United Kingdom, on an average of the three preceding years as directed in Case I, without any deduction or abatement other than is therein allowed.”

The relevance of r. 2 to the question now before us is that in Diggines v. Forestal Land Co. (1) it was decided that the income, the full amount whereof
F had to be computed under r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to Case V, was the full amount of all the income arising from stocks, shares and rents, and that there was no justification for further sub-division or for treating each separate holding separately. Certain decisions of this court indicated some loopholes in the provisions applicable to Case V and the law was altered in 1926 to fill the gaps. Counsel for the Crown invited us to bear this in mind when considering the case now before us, but the cases to which he referred us do not indicate that the precise point with which we have to deal was before the court in any of them. I think counsel for the taxpayers was right when he said that the intention and effect of the Finance Act, 1926, was to impose a tax on the subject where no tax was previously payable and that we must construe the relevant sections of the Act of 1926 like any other section imposing a tax on the subject.
G

H I turn, therefore, to the Finance Act, 1926. Section 29 (1), read with s. 37 (2) so far as it relates to Case V of sched. D, in substance provides that any income tax chargeable thereunder which would theretofore have been computed on the basis of a three years average shall, as from Apr. 6, 1927, be computed, subject to the other provisions of Part IV of the Finance Act, 1926, and subject as thereafter in s. 29 provided, on the full amount of the profits or gains or income of the year preceding the year of assessment. The proviso to s. 29 referred to, so far as relevant, is in the following terms :

"Provided that . . . (b) In the case of income tax chargeable under . . . Case V of sched. D—(i) income tax shall be computed, as respects the year of assessment in which the income first arises, on the full amount of the income arising within that year; (ii) where the income first arose on some day in the year preceding the year of assessment other than the sixth day of April, income tax shall be computed on the income of the year of assessment; (iii) where the income first arose on the sixth day of April in the year preceding the year of assessment, or on some day in the year next before the year preceding the year of assessment other than the sixth day of April, the person charged shall be entitled, on giving notice in writing to the surveyor within twelve months after the end of the year of assessment, to be charged on the amount of the income of that year, and if the tax charged has been paid, any tax overpaid shall be repaid."

It is to be observed that this proviso deals with computation in three different years of assessment.

Had the shares in Goodlass Wall y Cie been the only possession held by the taxpayers which came under r. 1, this proviso would have been applicable to the dividend now in question, but in view of the decision in the Forrestal Land case (1) and of the fact that the taxpayers at the material dates held other foreign stocks or shares, the proviso would not be applicable if the matter rested on s. 29 alone. Section 30, however, provides :

"All profits or income in respect of which any person is chargeable either under r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to Case III of sched. D, or under Case IV of sched. D or under Case V of sched. D may respectively be assessed and charged in one sum."

I pause here to observe that the power there given is, no doubt, a power exercisable in each year of assessment as regards the profits or income of that year. It is subject to two provisos. The first proviso reads as follows :

"If in any year of assessment any person charged or chargeable in respect of any such profits or income as aforesaid ceases to possess any particular source of any such profits or income or any part of any such source, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source or that part shall be computed separately, and the provisions of the section in this Part of this Act which relates to the discontinuance of a trade, profession or vocation, shall, subject to the necessary modifications, apply in any such case as if the cesser of the possession of the source or part were the discontinuance of a trade."

The section there referred to is s. 31, which is in these terms :

"(1) Where in any year of assessment a trade, profession or vocation is permanently discontinued, then, notwithstanding anything in this Part of this Act—(a) the person charged or chargeable with tax in respect thereof shall be charged for that year on the amount of the profits or gains of the period beginning on the sixth day of April in that year and ending on the date of the discontinuance, subject to any deduction or set-off to which he may be entitled under the section of this Part of this Act which provides for relief in respect of certain losses or under r. 13 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, and, if he has been charged otherwise than in accordance with this provision, any tax overpaid shall be repaid, or an additional assessment may be made upon him, as the case may require."

Paragraph (b) provides for the re-opening of the accounts, if necessary, for the previous year, and for an additional assessment, but I do not think I need refer to it in detail, or to sub-s. (2) of that section. I return to proviso (ii) to s. 30, which is in these terms :

“ If in any year of assessment any person acquires a new source of any such profits or income or an addition to any source of any such profits or income, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source or from the addition to that source shall be computed separately, and in the case of profits or income chargeable under r. 1 of the Rules Applicable to Case III the provisions of para. (1) of r. 2 of those rules shall apply, and in the case of profits or income chargeable under Case IV or Case V of sched. D the provisions of proviso (b) to sub-s. (1) of the last preceding section of this Act shall apply.”

B That is the important proviso for the matter we have to consider.

Counsel for the taxpayers says, first, that the expression “ the year of assessment ” must bear the same meaning in each paragraph of the proviso to s. 30 and must in each case mean the year in which the assessment in question is made. Secondly, he says that the income tax to be computed separately must be the income tax for that year on the profits or income from a source or part of a source or addition to a source, whichever be in question. Applying those principles to the facts of this case, he says that in the year of assessment 1942-43 the taxpayers acquired no new source, and, therefore, proviso (ii) is not applicable and no additional assessment is justifiable. Before the Special Commissioners the Crown argued that the income received from Goodlass Wall y Cie in 1942-43 was, within the meaning of proviso (ii), an addition to a source of income. The commissioners rejected that argument, and before the learned judge and before us the Crown has admitted that they were right in so doing. Counsel for the Crown, however, relies on an alternative point which was taken before the commissioners and was the only point argued before the learned judge. It is stated in the Case, as follows :

E “ . . . that even if the shares in the Argentine company were an addition acquired by the appellant company in a year of assessment before 1942-43 to a source of income chargeable under Case V of sched. D, nevertheless under s. 30, proviso (ii), of the Finance Act, 1926, the income from the shares in the Argentine company had to be computed separately and the provisions of proviso (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 29 of the said Act applied, with the result that as respects the year of assessment in which income from the Argentine shares first arose, namely 1942-43, income tax had to be computed on the full amount of the income arising within that year, namely, £7,434.”

G Counsel for the Crown elaborated the argument on the following lines. First, he admitted that, if possible, the words “ in any year of assessment ” should be given the same meaning in both paragraphs of the proviso, but he said the natural meaning was that the inspector when making his assessment in year 1 must look and see whether the events referred to in the provisos had occurred in year 1 or in any preceding year of assessment. If any such event had occurred, the inspector must give effect to the provisos. He did not agree that only the income tax for year 1 could be affected by proviso (i). He submitted that it was the proviso which made it clear that in year 2 nothing could be included for income received in year 1 from a source which ceased to be possessed in that year. He added that even if he was wrong on this point, it did not follow that a restricted meaning should be placed on the expression “ year of assessment ” but merely that owing to the subject-matter with which the first paragraph of the proviso was dealing, the proviso might in operation have a limited effect. Turning to the second paragraph of the proviso, he pointed out that, if the argument of counsel for the taxpayers was well founded, it meant that full effect would not be given to the direction to apply proviso (b) to s. 29 since effect would only be given, at most, to para. (i) of proviso (b). He further pointed out that in certain circumstances no effect whatsoever would be given to proviso (b). Thus, assume that in the year 1936-37 and the preceding year the taxpayers had income from other foreign stocks and shares. In that year they acquired an addition to a source, namely, shares of the nominal value of £100,000 in Goodlass Wall y Cie. In assessing the taxpayers under Case V for that year, he would have to give effect to proviso (ii) to s. 30, but he could not apply proviso (b) (i) as directed thereby since no income was received from the £100,000 worth of shares in the year 1936-37. He contrasted that state of affairs with the position if his construction were accepted. The inspector, when making his assessment in each year after 1936-37, would have to take note of the fact that shares had been acquired in that year. In the first year in which income arose he would assess the taxpayers under proviso (b) (i) and he would give effect to paras. (ii) and (iii) of proviso (b) in each of the two following years. We were informed that a similar argument was addressed to the learned judge in the court below by the SOLICITOR-GENERAL. It was rejected by the learned judge, first, because his own prima facie view was that the words "if in any year of assessment" meant the year for which tax was being computed; secondly, because he was impressed by the argument of counsel for the taxpayers based on a comparison of the two paragraphs of the proviso to s. 30; and, thirdly, because he accepted an argument of counsel for the taxpayers based on the definition of "year of assessment" in the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 237.

So far as the first two grounds are concerned, it is sufficient for me to say that I think the answer given by counsel for the Crown is correct. I do not think that the construction for which he argues involves a strained construction or involves placing a different meaning on the words in question in one proviso from that adopted in the other. True it is, that on the argument of counsel for the Crown the same result would have been achieved if each proviso had commenced "If at any time," but in a proviso dealing with method of computation it is not unnatural to refer instead to "any year of assessment." I do not think that we should be justified in adopting an interpretation which, as counsel pointed out, might involve that partial, or, indeed, no, effect would be given to proviso (b) of s. 29 when made applicable by the second paragraph of proviso (ii) to s. 30. I must say a little more about the third ground. In the Income Tax Act, 1918, s. 237, "Year of assessment" is defined as follows:

"'Year of assessment' means, with reference to any tax, the year for which such tax was granted by any Act granting duties of income tax."

Counsel for the taxpayers says the definition applies and since we are dealing with tax granted for the year 1942-43, the expression "any year of assessment" must be confined to that year, but this argument, in my opinion, ignores the fact that the definition only applies "unless the context otherwise requires." The use of the word "any" before the words "year of assessment" and the fact that the whole of proviso (b) is imported and that proviso affects more than one year of assessment, in my opinion, require that a wider meaning shall be given to the words "any year of assessment" than that of the definition. For these reasons I would allow the appeal.

TUCKER, L.J. : I agree with the judgment which has been delivered by COHEN, L.J. The construction of the words "any year of assessment" in proviso (ii) to s. 30 of the Finance Act, 1926, is, I think, assisted by re-writing the whole of s. 30 so as to give effect to s. 31 as regards proviso (i) and proviso (b) (i) to s. 29 (1) as regards proviso (ii). So re-written, s. 30, so far as material, reads as follows:

"All profits or income in respect of which any person is chargeable under r. 1 of Case III or under Case IV or Case V of sched. D may respectively be assessed and charged in one sum: Provided that—(i) If in any year of assessment any person charged or chargeable in respect of any such profits or income as aforesaid ceases to possess any particular source of any such profits or income or any part of any such source, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source or that part shall be computed separately, and the person charged or chargeable with tax in respect thereof shall be charged for that year on the amount of the profits or gains of the period beginning on April 6 in that year and ending on the date of discontinuance: (ii) If in any year of assessment any person acquires a new source of any such profits or income or an addition to any source of any such profits or income, income tax in respect of the profits or income from that source shall be computed separately, and in the case of profits or income chargeable under Case V of sched. D income tax shall be computed as respects the year of assessment in which the income first arises on the full amount of the income arising within that year."

If in each of these provisos the words "any year of assessment" are construed as meaning "in any income tax year" the provisions seem to me to be clear and to work out naturally. Furthermore, in proviso (ii), so re-written, you get the contrast between "any year of assessment" in the opening line and "the year of assessment" in the concluding words where the year in which the computation to tax has to be made. I agree that the appeal succeeds.

ASQUITH, L.J.: I also agree.

Appeal allowed with costs in Court of Appeal and below.

Solicitors: Solicitor of Inland Revenue (for the Crown); Linklaters & Paines (for the taxpayers).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Reversed. C.A. [1949] 1 All E.R. 874.

CAMINER AND ANOTHER v. NORTHERN AND LONDON INVESTMENT TRUST, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), November 16, 17, 26, 1948.]

Negligence—Nuisance—Tree—Elm tree adjoining road—Fall on passing car—Fall due to disease and want of lopping—Liability of occupier of land.

The defendants were lessees of a block of flats which they occupied by their tenants. In the forecourt of the flats was a row of elm trees. On Apr. 7, 1947, the plaintiffs were driving past the flats when one of the trees fell on the car, wrecking it and injuring both the plaintiffs. The fall was proved to have been due jointly to a disease of the roots, which was of long standing, but not apparent, and to the tree's large crown which had not been trimmed or lopped for many years. Evidence was given that elm trees should be inspected every five to seven years, and, if this tree had been lopped, there was no reason to suppose that it would have fallen when it did.

HELD: it is the duty of all owners of property to manage it in accordance with the principles of good estate management, so that their property may not be in a condition likely to cause damage to persons lawfully using highways in the immediate vicinity; if good estate management involves the inspection and trimming of trees from time to time, there is a duty on landowners to carry out those operations; and, therefore, the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs.

[AS TO THE OCCUPIER'S DUTY TOWARDS THE PUBLIC IN RESPECT OF THE STATE OF PREMISES ADJOINING A PUBLIC PLACE, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 23, pp. 619-621, para. 870.]

Cases referred to :

- (1) Noble v. Harrison, [1926] 2 K.B. 332; 95 L.J.K.B. 813; 135 L.T. 325; 90 J.P. 188; Digest Supp.
- (2) Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan, [1940] 3 All E.R. 349; [1940] A.C. 880; 164 L.T. 72; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (3) Brown v. Harrison, (1947), 177 L.T. 281; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (4) Cunliffe v. Bankes, [1945] 1 All E.R. 459; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for damages for negligence and/or nuisance.

The first plaintiff and his wife, the second plaintiff, were injured by the fall of an elm tree standing on property occupied by the defendants. It was contended that the defendants were negligent in not having caused the tree to be cut. The defendants maintained that, although an expert might have been aware of the necessity of taking such precautions, this would not be apparent to an ordinary landowner. LORD GODDARD, C.J., held that it was a reasonable and proper precaution for the occupier of property to top elm trees bordering the highway and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. The facts appear fully in the judgment.

Fox-Andrews, K.C., and Rees-Davies for the plaintiffs.

Marven Everett for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26. LORD GODDARD, C.J., read the following judgment. On Apr. 7, 1947, soon after mid-day, Mr. and Mrs. Caminer, the plaintiffs, were driving along Prince Albert Road, St. John's Wood, in their car. The day was fine, and, though there was nothing exceptional about the wind, it was, no doubt, blowing in strong squally gusts from time to time. As they were passing a block of flats known as St. James's Close, which is situate by the corner of Prince Albert Road and Wells Rise, a large elm tree in the forecourt of the flats and more or less in the corner formed by the two roads fell on the car, wrecking it and injuring both the plaintiffs. The defendants are the lessees of the flats and occupied them by their tenants. They became the lessees in 1940, and the premises were requisitioned by the Air Ministry in June, 1941. The Ministry remained in occupation till some time in April, 1946. when the premises were returned to the defendants, who thereupon set about repairing some bomb damage to the side of the block of flats facing on Wells Rise, but I do not think it necessary to enter into any detail with regard to the damage or the repairs, as there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that either has any real connection with the fall of the tree.

The tree in question was a large, well-grown elm, between 120 and 130 years old, and, when it fell, it was apparent from the base of the tree that it had been affected by a disease not uncommon in elm trees known as elm butt rot. I accept the evidence of a forestry expert called by the defendants, Mr. Le Sueur, who had an opportunity of inspecting its base and roots after the tree had been removed. Three roots had been badly affected by rot, and the other three showed signs of rot, but were not so badly affected and had snapped when the tree fell. The disease is caused by a fungus which attacks the roots if there has been any wound which permits the fungus to enter. The wounding may happen in a variety of ways, but I am unable to find here that there had been any cutting of the roots, as Mr. Le Sueur, who is the only witness who made anything like a close inspection, was unable to find any indication that the roots had at any time been cut. Moreover, the disease that he found was of long standing and must have been in the roots long before the defendants took possession of the property. There was no indication from the condition of the tree above ground that it was suffering from this disease, and, in fact, according to Mr. Le Sueur, the disease in this case had not taken a normal course, for the fungus was working out sideways along the main roots and did not affect the trunk of the tree. A section of the trunk, which had been cut quite close to and above the ground, was exhibited in court, and appeared to show that the wood was in sound condition. I am quite satisfied that there was nothing in the appearance of the tree to indicate that it was in any way diseased. The tree, however, carried a considerable crown, the extent of which was estimated by the witness Dunk, the garden superintendent of the St. Marylebone Borough Council, who saw the tree, at some 35 feet. The tree had never been trimmed or lopped, at any rate for a great many years. Indeed, it is doubtful if it ever had been in the course of its life. Elms are shallow-rooted trees and are said to be notoriously treacherous and apt to fall, partly, I suppose, because they are susceptible to rot and partly because of the shallowness of their roots.

Having carefully considered the evidence of both experts and the evidence of the timber merchant or contractor who was called before me, I have come to the conclusion that the fall was due to a combination of circumstances, namely, the action of the wind on a tree bearing a large crown or tophammer when the roots of the tree had rotted to a greater or lesser extent. Had it not been for the condition of the roots, it is probable that the wind was not heavy enough on the day in question to cause the tree to fall. On the other hand, had the tree not been bearing the amount of tophammer that it, in fact, was, and if it had been topped or pollarded, there is no reason to suppose that the tree would have fallen when it did, and it might have stood for a very considerable time.

For the purpose of this case, it seems to me to be immaterial whether the cause of action is laid in negligence or in nuisance, for it is now well settled that the owner of property on which a nuisance exists, but which has not been caused by him, is not liable for injury caused thereby unless he omits to remedy it within a reasonable time after he became aware or ought to have become aware of the danger: Noble v. Harrison (1), Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan (2). This property was managed for the defendants by a firm of London estate agents, who had, shortly before the accident, given orders to a contractor, who was called before me, to lop and top the trees which were in the forecourt of St. James's Close. This work had progressed some way, and, had it not been for the Easter holidays, this tree, which they had left along with one other to the end, would probably have been pollarded or topped before the day in question, and, in that case, this unfortunate accident would not, in my opinion, have happened. I have, therefore, to consider whether the defendants are responsible for allowing this tree to be in the condition in which it was and whether they had taken steps within a reasonable time to remedy what I think was a danger. As I have said, elms are notoriously treacherous trees. Whether I ought to impute this knowledge to the defendants or their agents may, perhaps, be open to question, but it is the duty of all owners of property to manage it in accordance with the principles of good estate management so that their property may not be in a condition likely to cause damage to persons lawfully using highways in the immediate vicinity, and, if good estate management involves the inspection and trimming of trees from time to time, there is a duty on landowners to carry out those operations. Mr. Le Sueur, who was called by the defendants, and who gave his evidence with a frankness which was most refreshing, said that elm trees should be inspected every five to seven years, and that if this tree had been lopped it is very unlikely that it would have fallen when it did. If, therefore, principles of good estate management require periodical inspection and cutting, it is not open to an occupier of property who maintains on his land trees which immediately adjoin or are very close to a highway to say: "Well, I did not know that I ought to have done it." Mr. Dunk, a witness to whom I have already referred, told me that the elms on the other side of the road had been pollarded. The defendants' agents had given instructions for these trees to be cut, it was said, because the repair of the war damage had been finished and it was thought there should be a general tidying up of the property. I must, however, point out that the defendants had had ample opportunity of topping these trees both before the requisitioning by the Air Ministry and since they regained possession in April, 1946.

That there must be a duty to take precautions with regard to trees adjoining a highway cannot be doubted. What would amount to an adequate performance of that duty varies, no doubt, with the circumstances. It may well be that trees in the vicinity of a country lane would not require to be inspected or cut so often as those which adjoin busy thoroughfares, and it must be remembered that, while, no doubt, some squares in London are planted with elms, they are not a common feature of the landscape in the ordinary London street. The defendants strongly contended that, though an expert might be aware of the danger or of the necessity of taking such precautions as those to which I have referred in the way of pollarding or lopping, the necessity would not be apparent to an ordinary landowner, and, in this connection, reliance was placed on Brown v. Harrison and Another (3), in which the Court of Appeal approved of a ruling by STABLE, J., that the test was whether the danger was one which was apparent to an ordinary layman and not only to an expert. That, however, was a case where a dead tree fell, and it is true that in that case the judge found that it was apparent to the owner that the top boughs were dead and, therefore, likely to blow down. In this case the evidence satisfies me that it is a reasonable and proper precaution for the occupier of property on which there are elm trees bordering or near to the road to top or pollard them as an ordinary incident of good estate management. I may say that this was the opinion of SINGLETON, J., in Cunliffe v. Bankes (4). The learned judge in that case concluded his judgment by saying ([1945] 1 All E.R. 465):

"Those who have property of this kind have to realise there is a duty to the public."

He emphasised that the duty was there, though in that case he held that the owner had adequately performed the duty by periodical inspection. In this case, I think that the defendants did not realise their duty, and, though, with another object in view, namely, to get a tidy appearance, they had begun to do what good management required, unfortunately they had not done so in time. Consequently, in my opinion, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, and there will be judgment for the agreed amounts of £550 in the case of the male plaintiff and £850 in the case of his wife.

Judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Solicitors: G. Howard & Co. (for the plaintiffs); Barlow, Lyde & Gilbert (for the defendants).

[Reported by F. A. AMIES, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.]

Re KRIS CRUISERS, LTD.

CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), November 29, 1948.]

Company—Charge—Registration—Extension of time—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 101.

The power of the court to grant an extension of time for the registration of charges, under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 101, is a discretionary power in that the statutory right in the chargee to be relieved of the consequences of his negligence is subject to his proving to the satisfaction of the court that the omission to register within the proper time was not fraudulent, but was accidental or due to inadvertence or to some other sufficient cause, and, therefore, the court should be fully informed of the circumstances which gave rise to the omission, and the evidence should not merely state that the matter was accidental or due to inadvertence.

On an application by the chargees, under s. 101 of the Act of 1948, for extension of time for the registration of charges, evidence was given that the failure to register within the proper time was due to the fact that the secretary of the company thought that the chargees had registered, while the chargees thought that the secretary of the company had registered. The company was not solvent at the time of the application.

HELD: (i) the evidence, though meagre, was just sufficient to satisfy the provisions of s. 101, and the extension should be granted.

(ii) the insolvency of the company was not a matter to which the court need pay attention.

Observations of ROMER, L.J., in Re M.I.G. Trust, Ltd. ([1933] Ch. 570; 149 L.T. 63), applied.

Re Charles (L.H.) & Co., Ltd. ([1935] W.N. 15), distinguished.

[AS TO EXTENSION OF TIME FOR REGISTRATION, see HALSBURY, Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 5, pp. 512, 513; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 10, pp. 790, 791, Nos. 4952-4970.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Re Charles (L.H.) & Co., Ltd., [1935] W.N. 15; Digest Supp.
- (2) Re M.I.G. Trust, Ltd., [1933] Ch. 542; 102 L.J.Ch. 179; 149 L.T. 56; affd. on other grounds, sub nom. Peat (Sir William Henry) v. Gresham Trust, Ltd., [1934] A.C. 252; Digest Supp.
- (3) Re Cardiff Workmen's Cottage Co., Ltd., [1906] 2 Ch. 627; 75 L.J.Ch. 769; 95 L.T. 669; 10 Digest 791, 4967.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS by chargees of a company applying, under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 101, for an extension of time for registering two charges with the Registrar of Companies. VAISEY, J., granted the application and made an order in the usual form. The facts appear in the judgment.

R. Hunt for the chargees.

The company was not represented.

VAISEY, J.: This is an application, under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 101, asking the court to extend the time for delivering to the Registrar of Companies, for registration, two instruments of charge, dated Mar. 7, 1947. In this case, as in others which have come before me, I desire to call attention to the meagre character of the evidence filed in support, which, however, in this case seems to me to be just, though only just, sufficient to satisfy the provisions of the section. I think it is most important that the court should be fully informed of the circumstances which have given rise to the omission to register within the proper time and that the evidence should not, as is so often the case, merely state that the matter was accidental and due to inadvertence.

tence without particularising the reasons for the breach of the statutory requirements and the surrounding circumstances. People seem to be under the impression that, on their merely saying that the omission was "due to inadvertence," the court is practically obliged to exercise the power, which I hold to be a discretionary power, under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 101. This section replaced the Companies Act, 1929, s. 85, which itself was taken from s. 96 of the Act of 1908, and that, in turn, reproduced s. 15 of the Act of 1900.

There has been some difference of judicial opinion as to the principles on which this discretionary power should be exercised, and there is no doubt that in Re Charles (L.H.) & Co., Ltd. (1), the latest of the reported cases, CLAUSON, J., indicated that the solvency or insolvency of the company was a matter to be taken into special consideration when applications of this description were brought before the court. In my view, however, that decision of a learned judge whose experience in company matters was almost unequalled must be regarded as exceptional, for there, be it observed, notices convening a meeting to consider a resolution for voluntary winding-up had actually been sent out at the time when the matter came before the court for decision. In my judgment, that case and the order which was made therein must not be followed except, possibly, in a case where the facts are precisely identical.

The authority by which I consider myself bound is Re M.I.G. Trust, Ltd. (2). In that case there was an appeal to the House of Lords where the judgment of the Court of Appeal was affirmed without, as I understand, anything being said in the speeches to the House to throw more light on the matter than appears in the report of the decision of the Court of Appeal. I propose to accept as accurate and to follow the observations made in that case by ROMER, L.J. After calling attention to the fact that BUCKLEY, J., in Re Cardiff Workmen's Cottage Co., Ltd. (3) had suggested that provisions ought to be inserted, at any rate, in certain cases, for the protection of unsecured creditors as such, ROMER, L.J. ([1933] Ch. 570; 149 L.T. 63) expressed dissent from that proposition. For many years it has been the practice to insert in orders of this character, where the period for registration has been extended, a traditional and well-settled form of proviso for the protection of persons whose rights accrued between the date of the charge and its actual registration, and there has been a good deal of judicial discussion on the precise effect of those words. I do not myself propose to add to that discussion. The protecting words will go into this order, as they go into every similar order, so far as my experience goes, and the effect of them is now, I think, a matter which is beyond discussion, at any rate in this court, namely, that they are for the protection of persons to whom have accrued rights of property in the assets of a company and that they do not extend to protect the inchoate or other rights of unsecured creditors as such. The position is certainly peculiar and I think in some respects anomalous. It has been pointed out that the absence of the charge on the register may possibly have induced people to give credit to the company on the footing that the assets of the company were not subject to any registrable charge or mortgage.

There is a statutory right in the mortgagee or chargee to come to the court to be relieved of the consequences of his own negligence and lack of caution, provided that the court is satisfied that the omission to register was not with any fraudulent intention, but was, in the words of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 101, "due to inadvertence or to some other sufficient cause." Pausing there, I think that the words, "some other sufficient cause," would be satisfied if it were proved that the secretary of a company had been wrongly advised by his solicitor or counsel that registration need not be sought. There are other possible circumstances to which those additional words following the word "inadvertence" might apply. In the present case the inadvertence was due to an obvious mistake. The solicitors of the chargees thought that the secretary of the company had registered the charges, as he ought to have done, and the secretary of the company thought that the chargees had registered the charges, as they might have done, and between the two of them, each supposing the other had carried out the requirements of the section, they overlooked the fact that neither of them had done so. That seems to me to be

A inadvertence, inattention, carelessness, but very far removed from the kind of case in which this relief should be refused—a typical case of which would be one in which there was some fraudulent or improper motive in withholding the knowledge of the existence of the charge from the public, to whom its registration would have given the appropriate notice.

I have hesitated in this matter because this section always seems to me to
B be rather a benevolent section in the sense that it appears to give the mortgagee or the chargee a complete and unfettered opportunity for repentance and to place him in the same position as if he had been careful and not careless—diligent and not negligent. In the present case I propose to make an order in the usual form with the usual qualifying words, and, although I am satisfied in this case that the company is very far from solvent, I think that its solvency
C or insolvency is not a matter to which I need pay attention. For that I think I have the authority of ROMER, L.J., in Re M.I.G. Trust, Ltd. (2). In the present case, I think the evidence goes just far enough, but I hope that, in future, applications of this kind will be supported by evidence much more carefully framed. Otherwise, I may find myself compelled to dismiss an application merely supported by evidence copied out of a common form book
D which informs me that the omission was “due to inadvertence” without going into any particulars of the nature of the inadvertence and the excuses which can be offered for the negligence and omissions on the part of those whose duty it is to comply with the statutory requirements of registration. There will be the usual order.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors : J. A. & H. E. Farnfield (for the chargees).

[Reported by H. McL. MORRISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

WILLIAM HILL (PARK LANE) LTD. v. ROSE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.JJ., and Jenkins, J.), November 25, 26, 1948.]

Gaming—Debt—Promise to pay by instalments—Consideration—Promise by bookmaker not to report to Tattersalls.

The defendant owed money to the plaintiffs, a firm of bookmakers, as the result of bets made on horse races. On July 8, 1947, the defendant was interviewed by a representative of the plaintiffs and was told that he would be reported to Tattersalls if he failed to pay his debt. The defendant then promised to pay off the debt by monthly instalments, completing payment by the end of the current flat racing season. On the same day as the interview, the plaintiffs wrote the following letter to the defendant “Dear Mr. R. Amount outstanding £4,587. Week ending June 7, 1947. Further to your call of this morning, I confirm our arrangement whereby we do not take any steps against you in consideration of your promise to pay the above outstanding debt by minimum instalments of £250 per month on the 20th of this month and on the 20th of succeeding months, subject to the entire debt being cleared and satisfied by the end of the present flat racing season and subject also to the matter being reconsidered at the end of August with a view to the monthly instalments being increased." This letter was not challenged by the defendant who did, in fact, pay £250 to the plaintiffs on July 23 and £200 on Sept. 21, After that he made no further payment. In an action by the plaintiffs for the recovery of the money,

HELD: there was a contractual promise by the plaintiffs, constituting good consideration moving from them, to take no action against the defendant if the debt was paid by instalments; the debtor, on his side, undertook to pay the money as set out in the letter; and the case, therefore, came within the principles laid down in Hyams v. Stuart King ([1908] 2 K.B. 696; 99 L.T. 424) and the defendant was liable on the debt.

Per DENNING, L.J.: Although there was a real consideration moving from the bookmaker, the new promise by the defendant to pay the betting debt by instalments was not a good consideration because it added nothing to the original promise, which was not enforceable, and, if it was not a good consideration, there was no new contract. The court in Hyams v. Stuart King (supra), in finding that there was a new contract, implicitly assumed that the new promise to pay was legally enforceable, whereas that was the very matter in debate, but, as that case had the authority of the Court of Appeal, it should be followed.

Hyams v. Stuart King ([1908] 2 K.B. 696; 99 L.T. 424), applied (but doubted by DENNING, L.J.).

[AS TO FRESH PROMISE FOR NEW CONSIDERATION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 15, pp. 476, 477, para. 873; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 25, pp. 400-403, Nos. 54-70.]

EDITORIAL NOTE. We are informed that the case referred to by DENNING, L.J., in his judgment (infra) as pending in the House of Lords and one in which the validity of Hyams v. Stuart King is to be tested is William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd. v. Hill which came before HALLETT, J. on July 7, 1947, and the Court of Appeal (LORD GODDARD, C.J., TUCKER, L.J., and EVERSHED, L.J.) on May 13, 1948.]

Cases referred to:

- (1) Norreys v. Zeffert, [1939] 2 All E.R. 187; Digest Supp.
- (2) Hyams v. Stuart King, [1908] 2 K.B. 696; 77 L.J.K.B. 794; 99 L.T. 424; 25 Digest 401, 58.
- (3) Poteliakhoff v. Teakle, [1938] 3 All E.R. 686; [1938] 2 K.B. 816; 107 L.J.K.B. 678; 160 L.T. 1; Digest Supp.
- (4) Guinness (Bob), Ltd. v. Salomonsen, [1948] 2 K.B. 42.
- (5) Vanbergen v. St. Edmunds Properties, Ltd., [1933] 2 K.B. 223; 102 L.J.K.B. 369; 149 L.T. 182; Digest Supp.
- (6) Alberg v. Chandler, (1948), 64 T.L.R. 394.

APPEAL by defendant from a decision of HALLETT, J., dated Apr. 30, 1948.

The plaintiffs, a firm of bookmakers, claimed £4,137 damages for breach of contract, this sum being the balance alleged to be due to the plaintiffs from the defendant under an agreement dated July 8, 1947. HALLETT, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the Court of Appeal now affirmed his decision. The facts appear in the judgment of BUCKNILL, L.J.

Salmon, K.C., and Gallop, K.C., for the defendant.

Barry, K.C., and Fearnley-Whittingstall for the plaintiffs.

BUCKNILL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of HALLETT, J., in favour of the plaintiffs for the sum of £4,137. The plaintiffs are a company whose business is that of bookmakers, and for some considerable time the defendant had been gambling with the plaintiff company in large sums on racehorses. In 1945 the defendant owed a large sum of money to the plaintiffs, and the debt eventually was put into the hands of a society which, I understand, is mainly occupied in collecting debts due to bookmakers. Eventually, a letter was written in December, 1945, by this society to the defendant in the following terms :

A "Please be good enough to let us have your cheque in settlement by return, as in the event of this matter not being arranged amicably, it will be open to our principals to report your default to the committee of Tattersalls, and a failure on your part to comply with any order which may be made by that committee may result in your being 'Warned off'."

B In consequence of that letter, the defendant paid. That letter shows that the defendant then learned what would be the effect of a report to the committee of Tattersalls of failure on his part to pay his racing debts, namely, that he would be warned off the turf with all the results that would follow, one of the results being that he would not be allowed to run any racehorse belonging to him at any recognised meeting. The defendant continued to bet with the plaintiffs, and at the end of May, 1947, he had incurred further heavy losses

C to the plaintiffs, ending with a disastrous week at Epsom, so that by the end of the racing week at Epsom—June 7—he owed £4,587. At that time the defendant owned two or three racehorses which were in training. On July 8, 1947, the defendant went to see the plaintiffs' representative, Mr. Marrison. Mr. Marrison had been a solicitor, and he had been, among other things, engaged as solicitor for a bookmaker in a case which came before ATKINSON, J., in 1939—Norreys v. Zeffert (1). The bookmaker in that case sued in respect of certain gambling debts, but he failed in his action. I mention that to show that Mr. Marrison was well aware of the legal position of debtor and creditor in respect of gambling debts. What happened at that interview, according to the evidence of Mr. Marrison was this: "I told him [the defendant] that,

D according to the instructions I had from Mr. Hill [a shareholder in the plaintiff company], he would not be able to have any winners because he would not even be able to have any runners. He said 'What do you mean by that?' I said: 'Well, if we report you to Tattersalls and you do not pay, you will be warned off and you know then that you will not be able to enter any of your horses at all.' He said to me—I cannot remember the exact words, but they were something like—"Surely Bill would not do that to me?" I told him that I had definite instructions that this must be done unless we came to some arrangement which was satisfactory to ourselves, to the company that is. Mr. Rose then said (it was his own idea as a matter of fact) that he could pay £250 a month. He said that it might be possible for him to make these payments bigger, but the minimum would be £250." The evidence then proceeds:

E " (Q) That would take about 18 months to pay it off? (A) Yes, about 18 months. (Q) That was July 8, 1947, and, therefore, on that basis, the whole amount would not have been paid by this time? (A) No. I pointed out to him it would take approximately 18 months and that would be too long. (Q) You did point that out to him? (A) Yes. He said: 'Well, I can definitely promise that I will pay the lot by the end of the flat season'."

F "I then said: 'What about increasing the monthly instalments after a couple of months or so?' and he agreed that after August the amount of the monthly instalments should be reconsidered. We parted in a very friendly way. He shook hands with me and thanked me for the assistance I had given him." Then counsel for the plaintiffs asked: "When this conversation ended what was the position in regard to Tattersalls? (A) That we would not report him to Tattersalls because of the promise he had made to settle this debt." In cross-examination there was some further evidence on this point. Mr.

G " (Q) That would take about 18 months to pay it off? (A) Yes, about 18 months. (Q) That was July 8, 1947, and, therefore, on that basis, the whole amount would not have been paid by this time? (A) No. I pointed out to him it would take approximately 18 months and that would be too long. (Q) You did point that out to him? (A) Yes. He said: 'Well, I can definitely promise that I will pay the lot by the end of the flat season'."

H "I then said: 'What about increasing the monthly instalments after a couple of months or so?' and he agreed that after August the amount of the monthly instalments should be reconsidered. We parted in a very friendly way. He shook hands with me and thanked me for the assistance I had given him." Then counsel for the plaintiffs asked: "When this conversation ended what was the position in regard to Tattersalls? (A) That we would not report him to Tattersalls because of the promise he had made to settle this debt." In cross-examination there was some further evidence on this point. Mr.

Marrison was asked whether any court proceedings had been mentioned at the interview and he replied: "Never mentioned at all." Counsel for the defendant then asked:

"(Q) I suggest you said: 'We would not like to take you to court'? (A) No, there was no mention of court proceedings. (Q) Never any suggestion of taking any steps, or any such phrase as that of "taking steps against you"? (A) No. I think there was a question of, not, I think, reporting to Tattersalls, but circulating him to the societies to which we belong, the Bookmakers' Protection Society and the National Sporting League. (Q) Was anything said about his club? (A) No, I do not know if he is a member of a club even. (Q) I used the word 'threatening' without any offensive implication. Did you intimate that, if he did not pay, in addition to informing Tattersalls you would report him to some other racing society? (A) Yes, the three societies, two of which were mentioned. (Q) Did you mention them all? (A) I said the societies, the bookmakers' societies. (Q) Did you use that phrase? (A) I think so."

On the same day as that interview the plaintiffs wrote this letter, signed by Mr. Marrison as general manager:

"Dear Mr. Rose, Amount outstanding £4,587 0s. 0d. Week ending June 7, 1947. Further to your call of this morning, I confirm our arrangement whereby we do not take any steps against you in consideration of your promise to pay the above outstanding debt by minimum instalments of £250 per month on the 20th of this month and on the 20th of succeeding months, subject to the entire debt being cleared and satisfied by the end of the present flat racing season and subject also to the matter being reconsidered at the end of August with a view to the monthly instalments being increased."

Apparently there was no answer to that letter by the defendant. He did not challenge in any way that it accurately stated the arrangement that had been made at the interview, and in pursuance of the arrangement he did, in fact, pay £250 to the plaintiffs on July 23, and on Sept. 21 he paid another £200, making a total of £450 in all. After that, he paid no more.

The defendant's version of the interview was quite different. He said that there was no reference to Tattersalls, and no reference to paying by the end of the flat racing season, and he said that at the end of the interview Mr. Marrison said: "Thank you very much, Mr. Rose. I am glad you agree with this because we would not like to take you into court on this matter." Counsel for the defendant then asked:

"(Q) Was anything said at all on the subject of Tattersalls? (A) Not a word. (Q) By either of you? (A) I beg your pardon. (Q) Did you say anything about Tattersalls? (A) No. Nothing about Tattersalls was mentioned at all. (Q) Did he say anything about Tattersalls? (A) No. (Q) Was anything said about the Bookmakers' Association? (A) No, of course not. Nothing at all."

There was that important issue of fact between those two people, both of whom I am satisfied were fully aware of the legal position of persons who incur gaming debts. It was for the learned judge to decide which of the two he believed, and he believed Mr. Marrison. The learned judge, apparently, thought nothing of the defendant as a witness. He said he was a "a deplorable witness," and that he saw no ground for disbelieving the evidence of the witness, Marrison. It seems to me that the subsequent events—the letter which I have read and the failure to challenge the statements therein—all bear out the substantial truth of Mr. Marrison's account.

The question arises whether this case comes within the principle laid down in Hyams v. Stuart King (2), or whether it comes within the principle of the other cases to which we have been referred, of which I think the most important is Poteliakhoff v. Teakle (3). As I understand the principle laid down in Hyams v. Stuart King (2) the question which arises is: Was there a separate contract made between the parties whereby, for good consideration, the debtor agreed to pay the sum which was due, either as a lump sum or by instalments? It is said, in the first place, that there was no such contract made in this case because there was no consideration for the promise by the defendant to pay the money as set out in the letter. As to that, the learned judge states quite correctly that the first issue is this: "What was the consideration moving from the plaintiffs for the promise which, on the evidence, I hold to have been made by the defendant?" and on that point the judge said:

"I take the view that the evidence here is sufficient to bring the case within the Hyams v. Stuart King (2) doctrine. I think here there was a contracting mind on both sides. I think the defendant was promising to pay, and was promising to pay, as he very well knew, in return for a promise on behalf of the plaintiffs that they would not report him to Tattersalls with the disastrous consequences which the defendant knew might well follow a racehorse owner so reported."

It seems to me that that really is a question of fact, and that, if the learned judge believed the evidence of Mr. Marrison (and he did believe it), clearly there was a promise by the plaintiffs through Mr. Marrison that, if Mr. Rose would pay the sums which are set out in the letter, the plaintiffs would not put the matter before Tattersalls or the societies mentioned.

The other point which is made on behalf of the defendant is that the agreement was void in point of law for uncertainty. It is said that the phrase: "We do not take any steps against you", is vague in point of time and vague in point of matter. Standing by itself, no doubt, the words are vague, but I think they must be read in conjunction with the interview which took place on that day. The letter says: "I confirm our arrangement whereby we do not take any steps against you . . ." and, linking the letter with the evidence of the interview, it is clear that the steps referred to there are those of not putting the matter before Tattersalls and the societies. The way I read this document is: "So long as you pay at least £250 per month on the 20th of each month, and so long as you clear the whole debt by the end of the present flat racing season," which was Nov. 22 and could be ascertained by looking at the RACING CALENDAR—"we will not take the steps which we have threatened to take. If you do not carry out your promise, either by failure to pay the instalments or by failure to clear the whole debt by Nov. 22, then we are relieved of our undertaking not to take steps and we shall hold ourselves at liberty to do so." That is a valid contract. In my view, this case clearly comes within the principles laid down by the majority of the court in Hyams v. Stuart King (2). I do not think it would be helpful to look at the other cases referred to in argument. They turn largely on questions of fact. I would dismiss this appeal.

DENNING, L.J.: The question is whether this case comes within Hyams v. Stuart King (2), i.e., whether there was a new and distinct contract for real consideration. The first question is whether there was a real consideration moving from the bookmaker. It is clear that mere forbearance from reporting to Tattersalls is not enough. There must be a contractual promise by the bookmaker to forbear: see Bob Guinness, Ltd. v. Salomonsen (4). On this point, I decline to have regard to the oral conversation. I look only at the document in which the bookmaker confirmed the arrangement. He put it into writing and presumably set down everything which was definitely arranged. He said:

"I confirm our arrangement whereby we do not take any steps against you in consideration of your promise to pay the above outstanding debt by . . . instalments."

There is there a definite promise by the bookmaker not to take any steps against the backer. It has been urged that that is too vague to be a contractual promise. I cannot take that view. On a proper interpretation of that document, the bookmaker promises not to take any steps against the backer, whether by way of posting at Tattersalls or otherwise, so long as the backer keeps up his instalments and pays the outstanding balance by the end of the flat racing season. On the authority of Hyams v. Stuart King (2) I accept the view that the promise was a real consideration moving from the bookmaker.

The second question is one which was not considered in Hyams v. Stuart King (2). It is this: Was there any consideration moving from the backer? If this had been a legal debt owing by the backer to the bookmaker, the new promise to pay by instalments would not have been a good consideration. A new promise by a debtor to pay his debt, even though accompanied by variations for his benefit such as to pay by instalments, is not a good consideration for a new promise by the creditor, as, for instance, a promise to forbear from taking bankruptcy proceedings: see Vanbergen v. St. Edmunds Properties (5). Is it any different when the original debt is not a legal debt but a betting debt? Speaking for myself, I should have thought that a new promise to pay a betting debt, even a new promise to pay by instalments, was of the same quality as the original promise to pay it, no better and no worse, and enforceable to the same extent, no more and no less. It has been held that a new promise to pay a betting debt, as, for instance, a promise contained in an account stated, is of the same quality as the original promise and is not enforceable by action at law: see Alberg v. Chandler (6). If this is correct, as I think it is, then the new promise here to pay the betting debt by instalments was not a good consideration because it added nothing to the original promise, and, if it was not a good consideration, there was no new contract. It was a mere nudum pactum. When I put this point to counsel for the plaintiffs, he answered that the new promise was a good consideration, because it was enforceable at law, whereas the original promise was not. That answer, however, exposes the fallacy. It assumes that the new promise by the backer is enforceable at law, whereas that is the very question to be determined. Once it is assumed, as I think it should be, that the new promise has the same quality as the original promise, then the new promise is no consideration because it adds nothing. I cannot help thinking that the same fallacy underlies the reasoning of the majority in Hyams v. Stuart King (2). In finding that there was a new contract, they implicitly assumed that the new promise to pay was legally enforceable, whereas that was the very matter in debate. Counsel for the defendants has told us that a case is already pending in the House of Lords in which the validity of Hyams v. Stuart King (2) is to be tested, and that, even if for any reason that appeal is not effective, the present case will be taken there. I am content, therefore, simply to say that Hyams v. Stuart King (2) has at present the authority of this court, and we should on this occasion follow it, even though its reasoning is open to question. On this ground, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, J. : I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Albin Hunt & Stein (for the defendant); Hardcastle Sanders & Co. (for the plaintiffs).

[Reported by C. ST. J. NICHOLSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

TILLEY v. TILLEY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Bucknill and Denning, L.J.J., and Hodson, J.), October 26, 27, November 29, 1948.]

Condonation—Evidence—Presumption against—Displacement by uncorroborated evidence of spouse.

A Divorce—Evidence—Proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery—Plea of condonation by co-respondent—Respondent a compellable witness—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 198.

B By the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 198 :
 “The parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and the husbands and wives of the parties shall be competent to give evidence in the proceedings, but no witness in any such proceedings, whether a party thereto or not, shall be liable to be asked or be bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery unless he or she has already given evidence in the same proceedings in disproof of the alleged adultery.”

C In January, 1948, a wife, after confessing to her husband that she had committed adultery, left the matrimonial home. On Feb. 12, 1948, the husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery. The suit was undefended except by the co-respondent on the issue of damages, but at the trial for the first time the co-respondent raised the issue of condonation, alleging that sexual intercourse had taken place between husband and wife on the occasion of two visits by the husband to her on Feb. 21 and 22, 1948. The co-respondent called the wife on subpoena, and the learned commissioner before whom the case was tried compelled her to answer, against her will, the question whether there had been any sexual relations between her and her husband since the petition was served. Her answer was in the affirmative, and the commissioner, thereupon, found that the husband had condoned the matrimonial offence and dismissed the petition.

E HELD : (i) a witness who is competent by virtue of the Judicature Act, 1925, s. 198, is also compellable, and, therefore, the steps taken by the judge to compel the wife to answer were lawful.

F (ii) there is a provisional presumption against condonation, and the uncorroborated evidence of the wife was insufficient to dispel this presumption.

[FOR THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (CONSOLIDATION) ACT, 1925, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Vol. 9, p. 391.]

Cases referred to :

- G (1) R. v. Lapworth, [1931] 1 K.B. 117; 100 L.J.K.B. 52; 144 L.T. 126; 95 J.P. 2; Digest Supp.
 (2) Leach v. R., [1912] A.C. 305; sub nom. Leach v. Public Prosecutions Director, 81 L.J.K.B. 616; 106 L.T. 281; 76 J.P. 203; 14 Digest 453, 4800.
 (3) Cavendish v. Cavendish, [1926] P. 10; 27 Digest 425, 4313.
 (4) Redfern v. Redfern, [1891] P. 139; 60 L.J.P. 9; 64 L.T. 68; 55 J.P. 37; 27 Digest 263, 2317.
 H (5) Churchman v. Churchman, [1945] 2 All E.R. 190; [1945] P. 44; 114 L.J.P. 17; 173 L.T. 108; 2nd Digest Supp.
 (6) Nottingham Guardians v. Tomkinson, (1879), 4 C.P.D. 343; 48 L.J.M.C. 171; 43 J.P. 735; 3 Digest 366, 68.
 (7) Campbell v. Campbell, Lewis & Keith, [1939] 4 All E.R. 529; [1940] P. 90; 109 L.J.P. 37; 162 L.T. 152; 2nd Digest Supp.
 (8) Sneyd v. Sneyd & Burgess, (1925), 42 T.L.R. 106; 27 Digest 431, 4391.

- (9) Blunt v. Park Lane Hotel, Ltd., [1942] 2 All E.R. 187; [1942] 2 K.B. 253; 111 L.J.K.B. 706; 167 L.T. 359; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (10) Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe, (1874), L.R. 2 Sc. & Div. 374; 43 L.J.P. & M. 49; 30 L.T. 649; 39 J.P. 4; 27 Digest 384, 3770.
- (11) Emanuel v. Emanuel, [1945] 2 All E.R. 494; [1946] P. 115; 114 L.J.P. 60; 173 L.T. 118; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (12) Durant v. Durant, (1825), 1 Hag. Ecc. 733; 162 E.R. 734; previous proceedings, (1824), 2 Add. 267; 27 Digest 337, 3171.
- (13) Elwes v. Elwes, (1794), 1 Hag. Con. 269; 161 E.R. 549; 27 Digest 296, 2726.
- (14) Joseph v. Joseph, [1915] P. 122; 84 L.J.P. 104; 112 L.T. 170; 27 Digest 562, 6183.
- (15) Winscom v. Winscom & Plowden, (1864), 3 Sw. & Tr. 380; 33 L.J.P.M. & A. 45; 10 L.T. 100; 27 Digest 345, 3264.
- (16) Ridgeway v. Ridgeway, (1881), 29 W.R. 612; 27 Digest 338, 3174.
- (17) Beard v. Beard, [1945] 2 All E.R. 306; [1946] P. 8; 114 L.J.P. 33; 174 L.T. 65; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (18) Glenister v. Glenister, [1945] 1 All E.R. 513; [1945] P. 30; 114 L.J.P. 69; 172 L.T. 250; 109 J.P. 194; 2nd Digest Supp.
- (19) Roberts v. Roberts & Temple, (1917), 117 L.T. 157; 27 Digest 339, 3182.

APPEAL by the husband from a decision of His Honour Judge SHOVE, sitting as a commissioner to hear divorce cases at Lincoln Assizes, dismissing the husband's petition for divorce on the ground that he had condoned his wife's adultery. The Court of Appeal ordered a new trial.

J. C. Lawrence and I. S. Warren for the husband.

S. L. Elborne (P. Lewis with him) for the co-respondent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 29. The following judgments were read.

BUCKNILL, L.J. : I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments of DENNING, L.J., and HODSON, J. I agree with their conclusion that the learned commissioner compelled the wife to answer the question put to her: "Has there been any sexual relation between you and your husband since the petition was served in this case?" The first question which the court has to decide is whether the learned commissioner was right in exercising this compulsion. The question turns on the proper interpretation to be placed on the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 198, which provides:

"The parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and the husbands and wives of the parties shall be competent to give evidence in the proceedings, but no witness in any such proceedings, whether a party thereto or not, shall be liable to be asked or be bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery unless he or she has already given evidence in the same proceedings in disproof of the alleged adultery."

These were proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and the witness was the wife of the petitioner, who was charging her with adultery with the co-respondent. In these circumstances the section provides that she was competent to give evidence in the proceedings. The question is whether she was also compellable.

Under normal conditions a person who is a competent witness is also compellable. This was stated in the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal in R. v. Lapworth (1). In that case a man was indicted for inflicting personal injury on his wife. The wife declined to give evidence against her husband, but the court held that she was a compellable witness. She was competent, because a wife had always been competent to give evidence in a criminal court against her husband that he had committed an assault upon her. Being competent, she was also compellable. AVORY, J., giving the judgment of the court, said ([1931] 1 K.B. 121) :

A “Once it is established that she is a competent witness, it follows that she is a compellable witness ; that is to say that she, having made her complaint of, or independent evidence having been given of, an assault on her by her husband, and she having been summoned, as she may be, she is, like all other witnesses, bound to answer any questions put to her. In other words, she becomes a compellable witness.”

B There is, however, an important exception to this rule, an exception which was the basis of the decision of the House of Lords in Leach v. R. (2). In that case the wife of a man charged with the crime of incest refused to give evidence against her husband, and the House of Lords held that she could not be compelled to do so. The case turned on the interpretation of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 4 (1), by which the wife of a person charged with an offence may be called as a witness either by the prosecution or the defence and without the consent of the person charged. The question for decision was whether the wife, who was a competent witness by reason of the section, was also compellable. Counsel for the Crown put forward the same argument as that which subsequently succeeded in R. v. Lapworth (1). He said ([1912] A.C. 309) :

D “If a person may be called the legal consequence is that he must submit to examination. There is no standing rule that a wife if competent is not compellable to give evidence. The Act of 1898 eschews the use of the word ‘compellable’ and that controversy. The words of the earlier statutes are ‘competent but not compellable’ not ‘competent and compellable,’ and where the word ‘competent’ is used without more the inference is that the witness is compellable.”

E The House of Lords, however, did not accept that argument. EARL LOREBURN, L.C., at the commencement of his speech said (ibid.) :

F “It is very desirable that in a certain class of cases justice should not be thwarted by the absence of the necessary evidence, but upon the other hand it is a fundamental and old principle to which the law has looked, that you ought not to compel a wife to give evidence against her husband in matters of a criminal kind.”

G Apart from the words of the material statutes, to which I must refer, one would think that, if a husband cannot be compelled to answer questions tending to show that he has committed adultery, his wife ought not to be compelled to answer questions tending to show that her husband has committed adultery. The law has always regarded, and still regards, adultery as allied to a criminal offence, as is shown by the decision of LORD MERRIVALE, P., in Cavendish v. Cavendish (3) ([1926] P. 13), where the court held that an order for discovery cannot be made against a party to divorce proceedings when it is sought for no other purpose than to prove that party guilty of adultery. LORD MERRIVALE, P., in his judgment quotes from the classic judgment of BOWEN, L.J., in Redfern v. Redfern (4) (ibid.) :

H “It is one of the inveterate principles of English law that a party cannot be compelled to discover that which, if answered, would tend to subject him to any punishment, penalty, forfeiture, or ecclesiastical censure. In these days, when the thunders of the Church have become less formidable, the rule, so far as it relates to ecclesiastical censure, seems to wear an archaic form ; but adultery is a charge of such gravity as to render it not unnatural that we should find the doctrine still applicable to it—that ‘no one is bound to criminate himself’.”

It is true that the question which the wife refused to answer in the present case was not directed to the question whether she had herself committed adultery, but, if the word "competent" in s. 198 of the Act of 1925 infers compulsion, then it seems to me that the wife of the co-respondent might be called by the petitioner husband and compelled to give evidence that her husband, the co-respondent, had committed adultery. The interpretation to be placed on this section in that instance goes far beyond the particular facts of the present case.

I now turn to consider the history of the Judicature Act, 1925, s. 198. That section repeated in practically identical terms s. 3 of the Evidence Act, 1869, which was itself repealed by the Judicature Act, 1925, so far as it related to the High Court. Section 1 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, repealed s. 4 of the Evidence Act, 1851, and so much of s. 2 of the Evidence Amendment Act, 1853, as is contained in the words "or in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery." By the Act of 1851, s. 2 the parties to an action, with the exception contained in s. 4, were made competent and compellable to give evidence. Section 4 of the Act provided :

"Nothing herein contained shall apply to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, or to any action for breach of promise of marriage."

Section 2 of the Evidence Amendment Act, 1853, subsequently repealed by the Act of 1869, provided :

"Nothing herein contained shall render any husband competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife, or any wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against her husband, in any criminal proceedings or in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery."

The result, therefore, of the Act of 1869 was to remove the disability of the parties or the wife or husband of a party in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery to give evidence and to render them competent to give evidence in such proceedings, with this protection, that the witness was not bound to answer questions tending to show that he or she had been guilty of adultery. There is no such protection in the case of a question tending to show that his or her spouse has been guilty of adultery. Having regard to the fact that s. 1 of the Act of 1853 makes the husbands and wives of the parties competent and compellable in any proceeding other than one instituted in consequence of adultery, I should have thought, if it is legitimate to speculate as to the intentions of the legislature except as shown by the actual words of the statute, that, if the legislature had intended in 1869 to make the parties and spouses of parties competent and compellable as witnesses in proceedings as to which they had been excluded as witnesses by the Acts of 1851 and 1853, the legislature would have said "competent and compellable" and not merely "competent." However, after considering the reasons contained in the judgments of DENNING, L.J., and HODSON, J., on this point, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that a witness who is competent by virtue of s. 198 of the Act of 1925 is also compellable. I now have to consider what is the proper order to make on this appeal. The trial of the issue of condonation was, in my opinion, very unsatisfactory. First, because the co-respondent's legal advisers gave no notice to the petitioner that they intended to raise the issue of condonation until after the case had been called on, although it appears from the statement of counsel for the co-respondent to the learned commissioner at the start of the trial that the wife had twice admitted intercourse to the co-respondent's solicitor after the filing of the petition. Mr. Stephen Dale, managing clerk to the solicitor for the co-respondent, was also called to prove that the wife made a statement to him on Apr. 5, and that when he served her with a subpoena on Apr. 30, she said her statement was true.

The trial took place on May 6. Having regard to the fact that the co-respondent admitted the adultery, I think it was the duty of the co-respondent's advisers to notify the petitioner in ample time before the trial that they intended to raise the issue of condonation. Secondly, when counsel for the co-respondent informed the court that he proposed to raise the issue of condonation, he gave the date of the alleged intercourse as Mar. 21, 1948, whereas it subsequently appeared from the evidence that the alleged dates were Saturday and Sunday, Feb. 21 and 22. Thirdly, the learned commissioner, on hearing that the issue of condonation was to be raised, said that he supposed the proper procedure was for him to hear the evidence of the petitioner, and counsel for the co-respondent could then call the wife on the question of condonation. With great respect to the learned commissioner, I think the proper procedure would have been for the counsel for the petitioner to ask for particulars of time and place of the alleged condonation and to have asked for an adjournment for the matter to be inquired into after those particulars had been given. Fourthly, I think that the learned commissioner did not apparently attach any importance to the contents of the letters to and from the co-respondent to the wife, of which the husband said he obtained possession on Feb. 22, letters which appear to me to have considerable importance on certain aspects of the issue of condonation. For these reasons, in my opinion, a serious miscarriage of justice may have taken place in this case owing to the way in which the issue of condonation was raised and tried. I, therefore, think that this court should set aside the judgment and order a new trial. I am anxious to say nothing which should in any way seem to indicate my opinion as to where the truth lies in this difficult and obscure case, and which might in any way tend to prejudice the trial. I think the trial should take place either locally or in London before another judge.

Having regard to the arguments on points of law addressed to us on this appeal, it may possibly be helpful to the trial judge if I indicate what those points were, and some at any rate of the considerations which may properly be borne in mind with reference thereto.

The first point taken was that there was no corroboration of the wife's evidence. As to that point, in my opinion, where the issue is one which depends entirely on the evidence of one spouse, which is denied by the evidence of the other spouse, especially where the evidence of each is equally credible or substantially so, the court naturally looks to see what corroboration, if any, there is of the evidence of either or both and in the absence of any corroboration looks to see where the burden of proof lies. I think it erroneous to say that the evidence of the wife in this case alleging sexual intercourse with her husband should not be acted on either as a matter of law or practice unless there is corroboration of her evidence. The decision in this case must ultimately depend on the relative credibility of the spouses as witnesses, on the probabilities of the case, and on the corroborative evidence, if any.

As regards the burden of proof, the principle has, I think, been laid down clearly by the Court of Appeal in Churchman v. Churchman (5). That was a case of alleged connivance at adultery, an act which one would think in the ordinary course of things required a higher degree of proof that the fact of marital intercourse between husband and wife, even after a confession of adultery. Be that as it may, in Churchman's case (5) the judgment of the court made it clear that, if at the end of the trial the evidence as to condonation is so evenly balanced that the court can come to no definite conclusion about it, then s. 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, comes into play, and the court, not being satisfied that there has been no condonation, is bound to dismiss the petition.

The second point argued before us was that the correspondence between the wife and the co-respondent, of which the husband took possession on Feb. 23, was some evidence of adultery between the wife and the co-respondent after the confession of adultery by the wife and their written admissions on Jan. 21, and that the alleged intercourse could not be taken as condonation of that later adultery. That is an issue which will need careful consideration at the new trial. It received no consideration at the first trial. I think that a husband only condones that which he knows, or ought as a reasonable man to expect at the time of the condonation. It seems to me to be a question of fact in this case whether the adultery, if any, which took place after the confession, should not have been anticipated by the husband as having taken place before he had the alleged intercourse with his wife on Feb. 22 and 23.

DENNING, L.J. : Two questions are raised in this case : (1) whether a wife is compellable to give evidence for or against her husband in proceedings instituted by him in consequence of her adultery ; (2) whether in the circumstances of this case the commissioner was right in dismissing the petition on the ground of condonation.

The husband is a signalman now aged 32. He married his wife on Mar. 23, 1940, when he was 24 and she was 18. They lived at Stamford in Lincolnshire and have two children aged 7 and 4. The marriage was happy until 1947, when the wife went to help in the shop of Mr. Hall, the co-respondent. He was 20 years older than she was. In January, 1948, she confessed to her husband that she had committed adultery with Mr. Hall and was expecting a baby. She left and went to her sister's house at Sutton-in-Ashfield, some 60 miles away, taking one child with her and leaving the other with her husband. On Feb. 12, 1948, he petitioned the court for a divorce on the ground of her adultery with Mr. Hall and claimed the custody of the children. He also claimed £400 damages from Mr. Hall. The wife did not enter an appearance or file an answer. Mr. Hall entered an appearance in which he did not contest the charge of adultery but limited himself to the issue of damages. On May 6, 1948, the case came on for hearing before the commissioner, sitting at Lincoln. The wife was in court, but not represented by counsel or solicitor. The co-respondent was represented by counsel, who, when the case was called on, rose and said that since the date of the petition there had been condonation on Mar. 21, 1948. The husband thereupon could, if he had wished, have asked for an adjournment, but he did not do so and the case proceeded on the basis that, although condonation was not pleaded, nevertheless the court had to be satisfied that the husband had not condoned the adultery, and, if it was not so satisfied, the petition would have to be dismissed.

The issue of condonation depended on what happened on the week-end of Feb. 21, 1948, three weeks after the wife left. The husband went over from Stamford to East Kirby (some 60 miles) to stay with his parents, and, while there, he went over to see his wife and child at her sister's house at Sutton-in-Ashfield, which was $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles away from his parents' house at East Kirby. He went over on the Saturday and Sunday afternoons for a couple of hours or so and saw his wife and 7 year old son. A young couple were also in the house on both afternoons, and the sister-in-law and her husband were in the house on the Sunday afternoon for some of the time. At these meetings with his wife and son the husband told his wife that he anticipated one day restoring the home, but he could not take her back as she was expecting a baby. On the second afternoon he found in her handbag some letters from the co-respondent to her which he did not read at the time but took away with him. He said that after he got back he read them and because of them he changed his mind and was not willing to take her back. Counsel for the co-respondent suggested to the husband in cross-examination that he had sexual intercourse with his wife on the two afternoons at Sutton-in-Ashfield, once in the bedroom and once in the kitchen. He firmly denied it, and pointed out that there were other people in the house and that he and his wife were not alone because their son was there. Throughout the cross-examination much confusion was caused by counsel for the co-respondent being wrongly instructed about the dates. He kept putting the date of the visit as Mar. 21, when it was in fact Feb. 21. The wife had been subpoenaed by the solicitor for the co-respondent, and, after the husband's case was closed, counsel for the co-respondent called her into the witness box. The commissioner then warned

A her that she was not bound to answer any questions admitting her adultery unless she chose to do so. She said: "I don't choose to do so." She gave her name and address and was then asked: "Do you remember your husband coming to see you and your child at Sutton-in-Ashfield?" She said "I don't wish to answer." After a little discussion between the commissioner and counsel, she was next asked: "Has there been any sexual relation between

B you and your husband since the petition was served in this case?" She said again: "I don't wish to answer." The commissioner then took a hand in the matter and, to use his own words, spoke to her "quite severely" and used "extreme pressure" on her to give evidence. His actual words to her were: "Whenever a witness appears in court, they are (sic) not entitled to refuse to answer a question except questions of certain sorts. I shall have

C to consider what steps to take." She was in tears by this time, and then the question was again put: "Has sexual intercourse taken place between you and your husband at Sutton-in-Ashfield since the petition was served?", and she eventually answered: "Yes." She said it happened in the bedroom and the kitchen, but she was never asked whether her husband was right in saying there were other people in the house and that their own son was with them

D all the time. At all events, she never contradicted her husband on those points. The commissioner was, however, much impressed by her reluctance to give evidence against her husband. He thought it showed her to be a truthful witness. He believed what she said and dismissed the petition on the ground that the husband, after knowledge of her adultery, had had sexual intercourse with his wife on Feb. 21 and 22, and had, therefore, condoned her offence.

E On those facts it is quite plain that the wife was compelled to give evidence against her husband when she was unwilling to do so. The question is whether that was lawful.

The argument that it was unlawful is simple and attractive. At common law neither husband nor wife was competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other. The relevant statutory provision which permits it

F in this case is the Judicature Act, 1925, s. 198, which says that:

"The parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and the husbands and wives of the parties shall be competent to give evidence in the proceedings . . ."

The section does not say they are to be competent and compellable. It is

G argued that the proper inference from that omission is that, although competent, they are not compellable. In support of the argument it is said that in criminal law where a statute has made a wife competent to give evidence against her husband, she is not compellable: Leach v. R. (2). The simplicity of the argument is, however, deceptive. It omits many relevant considerations which I will set down in historical sequence so as to show

H their bearing on the matter.

At common law the parties to an action and their husbands and wives were not competent to give evidence at all. This was changed by LORD BROUGHAM's first Evidence Act in 1851 which, by s. 2, made parties competent and compellable, but made an exception in the case of criminal proceedings (s. 3) and in the case of proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and any action for breach of promise of marriage (s. 4). The courts held that the Act of 1851, although applying to the parties themselves, did not apply to the husbands and wives of parties. These remained by the common law incompetent to give evidence. This was changed by LORD BROUGHAM's second Evidence Act, 1853, which, by s. 1, made the husbands and wives of parties competent and compellable, but by s. 2 made an exception in any criminal proceeding or "in any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery." In 1857 great changes took place in the law of husband and wife. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, created divorce courts to do what no court in England had ever been able to do before, namely, to pronounce decrees of divorce so as to permit re-marriage. The grounds of divorce allowed by that Act were almost exclusively adultery, with or without aggravating circumstances: s. 27; and the new courts had to observe the same rules of evidence as the common law courts: s. 48. Inasmuch as nearly all proceedings under the Act of 1857 were instituted "in consequence of adultery," that meant that in nearly every case neither the parties nor their husbands or wives were competent or compellable to give evidence. Some partial exceptions were made by ss. 43 and 46 of the Act of 1857 and by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 6, but these sections were obscurely worded and did not meet the situation. In particular, in most cases, though not in all, the parties were not able to give evidence in support of their own case or even of their own defence.

Then came the Evidence Act, 1869. The first thing done by that Act (s. 1) was to repeal the exceptions made in LORD BROUGHAM's Acts in respect of actions for breach of promise of marriage and proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery. The second thing was to make parties to an action for breach of promise competent to give evidence: s. 2; and the third thing was to make the parties to proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery competent to give evidence: s. 3. This clearly remedied the injustice whereby they were often not able even to give evidence, but the question is whether it did more, that is, whether it made them compellable. In order to ascertain the effect of the Act of 1869, it is necessary to consider the state of the statute book at that time. It is clear that from 1869 onwards the following sections were all in force in respect of proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery: (i) the Evidence Act, 1851, s. 2, which made parties competent and compellable; (ii) the Evidence (Amendment) Act, 1853, s. 1 which made the husbands and wives of parties competent and compellable; (iii) the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 43, which made a petitioner competent and compellable to give evidence at the instance of the court, but said that he was not bound to answer any question tending to show that he had been guilty of adultery; (iv) the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, s. 46, which made the parties to a matrimonial cause competent to give evidence by affidavit subject to cross-examination in open court; (v) s. 48 of the Act of 1857, which said that the rules of evidence observed in the common law courts were to be observed in the matrimonial courts; (vi) s. 6 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, which said that, on a wife's petition for divorce for adultery with cruelty, or adultery with desertion, the husband and wife should be competent and compellable to give evidence relating to the cruelty or desertion; (vii) the Evidence Act, 1869, s. 3, which said that the parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and the husbands and wives of such parties should be competent to give evidence in such proceedings, but gave witnesses, including parties, a privilege from answering any question tending to show that they had been guilty of adultery.

In my opinion, the result of those sections was that the parties to a suit instituted in consequence of adultery and their husbands and wives were not only competent but also compellable to give evidence subject only to the privilege from answering questions tending to show they had been guilty of adultery. My reasons are eight in number: (i) All the sections are expressed in affirmative terms and they are all consistent with one another. They must all, therefore, be given their full effect. Ever since the time of LORD COKE it has been held that where there are two consistent affirmative Acts of Parliament, each must be given its full effect. It would be contrary to accepted rules of construction to say that because s. 3 of the Act of 1869 is expressed in narrower affirmative terms than s. 2 of the Act of 1851 and s. 1 of the Act of 1853, therefore, those wider affirmative sections are to have their meaning cut down. (ii) Furthermore, if the legislature had intended that the parties and their husbands and wives were to be competent but not compellable, it would not have repealed the exception contained in s. 4 of the Act of 1851 and s. 2 of the Act of 1853. It would have retained that exception and made an exception to the exception. That is to say, it would have omitted s. 1 of the Act of 1869, and have made both ss. 2 and 3 run as follows: "Notwithstanding anything contained in any Act, the parties, etc., shall be competent to give evidence." That would have rendered the parties competent, but would have left them by common law still not compellable. As it is, by repealing the exceptions altogether, the legislature has made the wide terms of s. 2 of the Act of 1851 and s. 1 of the Act of 1853 applicable to those proceedings. This is a striking contrast to criminal proceedings, for when the legislature in 1898 made accused persons and their husbands and wives competent to give evidence the exceptions in LORD BROUGHAM's Acts in respect of criminal proceedings were retained and not repealed, thus leaving those persons by the common law still not compellable: Leach v. R. (2). (iii) If s. 3 of the Act of 1869 had been a complete code in itself, there would have been much force in the contention that the parties concerned are not compellable, but I have shown that s. 3 is not a complete code in itself. The law as at that time is to be ascertained from all the unrepealed sections of the Acts, including s. 2 of the Act of 1851 and s. 1 of the Act of 1853, which now stand intact without the exception as to proceedings in consequence of adultery. (iv) By various statute law revisions from 1892 to 1937 all the sections I have mentioned have been repealed except s. 2 of the Act of 1851, s. 1 of the Act of 1853, and s. 3 of the Act of 1869 (now the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1925, s. 198). The legislature clearly did not intend by their revisions to say that the parties who had been compellable by s. 43 of the Act of 1857 and s. 6 of the Act of 1859 were no longer compellable. Those sections were repealed because it was realised that those parties were compellable under the wider provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1851 and s. 1 of the Act of 1853, and that the narrower provisions were no longer necessary on the statute book. (v) The view which I have expressed is the same view as was taken by text book writers and judges from the very time that the Act of 1869 was passed, and their opinions are entitled to great weight. Contemporanea expositio fortissima est in lege. Mr. PITT TAYLOR's books on evidence are most illuminating on this point. The fifth edition, published in 1868, contains an elaborate exposition of the perplexities and inconsistencies that then existed, with numerous cases that had been decided on the statutes then in force: see art. 1220, A — D. The sixth edition, published in 1872, omits them all and treats it as obvious that since 1869 the parties and husbands and wives are competent by reason of s. 3 of the Act of 1869 and compellable by reason of LORD BROUGHAM's Acts of 1851 and 1853: see art. 1221. In 1878 LOPES, J., in Nottingham Guardians v. Tomkinson (6) (4 C.P.D. 350) said that the object of the Act of 1869 was to make them competent and compellable. In 1907, when Mr. WILLS in his book suggested that they were not compellable, Mr. PHIPSON (himself a great authority on the subject) immediately took him to task in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW and said they were compellable: see 24 L.Q.R. p. 214; and that view has been repeated in every edition of PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE ever since: see 8th ed., p. 451. (vi) The courts themselves have acted on the view that the parties are not only competent but also compellable. They have repeatedly compelled them to answer on oath interrogatories, and their affidavits in answer are evidence in the suit : see R.S.C., Ord. 31, r. 24. Thus, parties to an action for breach of promise of marriage (who by s. 2 of the Act of 1869 are also "competent" to give evidence) have always been compelled to answer interrogatories as to the matters in issue in the action. In CHITTY'S KING'S BENCH FORMS there is a standard form of interrogatories for such actions : see 17th ed., p. 333. Furthermore, parties to proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery have always been compelled to answer interrogatories as to any matters in issue except in so far as they are covered by the privilege : see Redfern v. Redfern (4) ([1891] P. 145, 6, 149). None of these parties could have been interrogated or his answers put in evidence except on the footing that, by LORD BROUGHAM'S Acts, he is compellable to give evidence. If he were not compellable, the interrogatories would have been disallowed. (vii) The same view was implicitly accepted by the Court of Appeal in Campbell v. Campbell (7), where a petitioner in an adultery suit was ordered to disclose documents relating to his associations with other women, and it was left to him to claim the privilege if it was open to him. He was thus compelled to produce evidence against himself. Cavendish v. Cavendish (3) was there explained as being based on the privilege, and, so explained, it affords no support for the view that a respondent cannot be subpoenaed or is not compellable to give evidence. (viii) If it be said that the legislature cannot have intended to compel a wife to give evidence against her husband, the answer is that, except in criminal proceedings, the legislature has shown that it does so intend. Take this very case. If the KING'S PROCTOR had intervened and alleged that the adultery had been condoned, the wife could have been compelled to give evidence as to the condonation : see Sneyd v. Sneyd & Burgess (8). Why should she not be compelled then at this stage ? And it is clear that, if a husband is charged with adultery in a slander action or an action for seduction, he may be compelled to give discovery and to answer interrogatories as to it, and his wife may be compelled to give evidence against him : see Blunt v. Park Lane Hotel (9). The reason is that, although adultery is a high moral offence, it is not a criminal offence and is not subject to any pains and penalties : see Mordaunt v. Moncreiffe (10) ; and there is no reason why a wife should not be compelled to give evidence against her husband with regard to it just as she would in an action for fraud or assault or any other civil wrong, however reprehensible. Indeed, in the House of Lords, LORD HATHERLEY (L.R. 2 H.L. (Sc.) 394, 395) specially referred to the Act of 1869 as being one of the many statutes which indicate that a divorce suit for adultery is a civil, not a criminal, matter.

If the view I have expressed in this case is not right, it means that the parties to a breach of promise action and the parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and their husbands and wives are in the same position as accused persons (and their husbands and wives) are in criminal proceedings since the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, that is, competent, but not compellable, to give evidence, to answer interrogatories, or to make discovery. The practice of the courts since 1869 negatives any such idea. For these reasons I am satisfied that every party to a divorce suit instituted in consequence of adultery is competent and compellable to give evidence, save only in so far as he can claim the privilege. He can be subpoenaed to give evidence and must give it so that the truth may be ascertained. If, however, questions are asked tending to show that he has been guilty of adultery, the judge will warn him that he is not bound to answer, and it is then for the witness to say whether he claims the privilege or not in respect of those questions. At this stage in the history of the law of evidence, the anomaly is not that he should be compellable to give evidence, but that he should have this privilege. In the present case, therefore, the wife was a competent and compellable witness and was properly subpoenaed. She was not bound to answer any questions tending to show that she had been guilty of adultery and she was not, in fact, compelled to do so. She was, however, bound to answer any other relevant questions, such as those which related to the visit of her husband to Sutton-in-Ashfield. The steps taken by the judge to compel her to answer were, therefore, lawful.

A The second question which arises in this case is whether the commissioner was right in dismissing the case on the ground of condonation. It was argued for the husband (1) that there was no corroboration of the wife's evidence of sexual intercourse; (2) that the husband did not have full knowledge of all the material facts. It was answered by the co-respondent that the evidence showed at least a suspicion of condonation which the husband had not dispelled. In the discussion of these points, much turns on the burden of proof. I, therefore, deal with that first.

B The effect of the statute as to burden of proof has been much misunderstood. At one time it was regarded as if it raised a presumption of connivance or condonation or collusion when there was none before, but that view was negatived by this court in Churchman v. Churchman (5). That case established that there was still a provisional presumption against connivance. There were circumstances of suspicion in that case ([1945] P. 55), but they were not such as to overthrow the provisional presumption against connivance. C The case shows that, in a case of connivance, it is only if the facts in evidence show, not a slight suspicion, but a reasonable suspicion amounting in effect to a provisional presumption of connivance that the burden is put on the petitioner to disprove it. The same reasoning applies to collusion: see Emanuel v. Emanuel (11). These principles must logically apply also to D condonation, because before the Act there was a presumption against condonation, just as there was against connivance and collusion. To be a bar, condonation had to be "clearly and distinctly proved": see per SIR JOHN NICHOLL in Durrant v. Durrant (12) (1 Hag. Con. 752). There is now still a presumption against condonation, but it is only a provisional presumption. E It stands a petitioner in good stead unless and until facts appear in evidence sufficient to displace it, that is, facts which are strong enough to raise a reasonable suspicion amounting in effect to a provisional presumption of condonation. Such facts, of course, will be of a different quality from those necessary to raise a provisional presumption of connivance or collusion which involve moral guilt, but the facts must still be of sufficient cogency to raise a provisional presumption of condonation. Then the petitioner, if he is wise, F will take steps to displace it, for the judge at the end of the case has to ask himself: Has the legal burden been discharged? Am I satisfied that there has been no condonation?

The question then arises: What facts are sufficient to raise a provisional presumption of condonation. An attempt at reconciliation is so much favoured by the law that it does not, in itself, give rise to any presumption of condonation. G It is only when the parties continue living together or are reinstated in one household that the judge is put on inquiry to see whether there has been condonation or not: see the judgment of SIR WILLIAM SCOTT in Elwes v. Elwes (13) (1 Hag. Con. 292). Short of that, if the parties have only met for a discussion on their affairs and have not spent the night together, there is no reason to suspect condonation. If that is all that has happened, and then H the rule is invoked that one act of sexual intercourse by the husband is conclusive evidence of condonation, then the party who relies on that act must at least point to a reasonable probability of it. After all, the act itself is not condonation. It is only evidence of it, albeit conclusive evidence, and it is only made conclusive because of the extreme prejudice which the wife may suffer if she has a child as the result of it. A party who relies on an act which has a conclusive effect in law (when there may have been no true reconciliation, and, therefore, no condonation in fact) must at least point to a reasonable probability of it. Any other view would gravely prejudice any attempt at reconciliation. No husband would ever be safe in meeting his wife on any single occasion with a view to reconciliation, for it would be in her power to assert that on that occasion he had had sexual intercourse with her, and he could only answer it with his own word in denial. The allegation is so easy for a wife to make and so difficult for a husband to refute that common sense requires that in the ordinary way the wife's word on it should not be accepted unless her evidence is corroborated in a material particular. This is the course which I have acted on in trying these cases, and it is fully supported by what SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., said in Joseph v. Joseph (14), and by text books such as RAYDEN ON DIVORCE, at p. 137. It is, however, a proposition of good sense and not a rule of law, and if the judge is, nevertheless, quite satisfied on the wife's evidence alone that sexual intercourse did take place, he is entitled to act on it.

Turning to the evidence in the present case, I can find nothing which is capable in law of being regarded as corroboration of the wife's story. Her tears in the witness box and her reluctance to give evidence cannot be regarded as corroboration, because no one can corroborate himself. The evidence of the husband not only supplies no corroboration, but makes it all the more imperative, for he said they were never alone. He said, indeed, that he loves her still, and he did admit that he told her that for the sake of the children he anticipated one day restoring the home. That was a very praiseworthy attitude in an injured husband who was attempting a reconciliation, but it does nothing to support the suggestion that there was sexual intercourse between them. The commissioner, however, seems to have been quite satisfied on the wife's evidence alone that sexual intercourse did take place, and, if there was nothing more in the case, I doubt whether this court would have interfered because of the absence of corroboration. Assuming, however, that there was sexual intercourse, there still will be no condonation unless the petitioner had at the time full knowledge of all the material facts relating to her adultery with the co-respondent. Now the evidence shows that on Friday, Jan. 30, the wife and the co-respondent made confessions of adultery in which they said they were still seeing one another. On Saturday, Jan. 31, she left her husband's house and stayed the night at a friend's house in Stamford. Then on Sunday, Feb. 1, she went to stay with her sister at Sutton-in-Ashfield. Three weeks later the husband went over there. That is the time on which the wife says sexual intercourse took place. The question is whether any material facts took place in those three weeks of which the husband was ignorant. He says that he did not know the contents of the letters from Mr. Hall to her (which were in her handbag) or from her to Mr. Hall (which were produced at the hearing). Those letters showed that during those three weeks, right up to the time of the husband's visit, love letters were passing daily and sometimes twice a day between Mr. Hall and the wife; that they were speaking to each other on the telephone nearly every evening; that he was sending tablets and powders to her apparently with a view to procuring her abortion; that he was worrying about the damages he might have to pay to the husband; that they both went together to see his solicitor in Peterborough on Feb. 11; that he went over to see her at Sutton-in-Ashfield on the week-ends of Feb. 8 and 15; that on these week-ends they had what each described as a "grand" and "glorious" time together; that he looked on her as his wife; and that she was assuring Mr. Hall of her love for him and was promising him to go back to him at Stamford as soon as he could find a bed for her. There was, therefore, ample evidence that the wife and the co-respondent were on very intimate terms right up to the time of the husband's visit. The question is whether that was a material fact. The relationship of husband and wife is one which requires the utmost good faith to be observed by the parties, and the test of materiality is similar to that applied in other relationships of a confidential nature. Material facts are those which might reasonably be expected to weigh with a reasonable husband in deciding whether to forgive his wife for her offence. Applying this test, I think the continuance of the association here was a material fact. The circumstantial details do not matter, but the continuing intimate association does matter. It is one thing to forgive a wife for past adultery when the association is over and done with. It is quite another to forgive her when the association is still continuing. There is little hope of any true reconciliation if a wife, while pleading with her husband to his face for forgiveness, still keeps seeing her lover behind his back. No man can be expected to condone his wife's adultery whilst that is going on. Even if the wife did not actually commit adultery during those three weeks (as to which I say nothing) the intimate association itself was a material fact. Such an association has been held sufficient to revive an antecedent condoned adultery: Winscom v. Winscom (15); Ridgway v. Ridgway (16); Beard v. Beard (17); and to justify a husband in separating from his wife, Glenister v. Glenister (18). It must, therefore, be a material fact for him to know. If it was unknown to the husband and undisclosed by the wife, it is as good a ground for setting aside the transaction as fraud itself. At least it would be so held in the case of any other confidential relationship, and of all relationships known to the law that of husband and wife is the most confidential.

The question, therefore, becomes whether the husband knew of this continuing association. Before his petition can be dismissed on this ground, the facts in evidence must at least point to some probability that he knew of it. As SIR JOHN NICHOLL said in Durrant v. Durrant (12) (1 Hag. Ecc. 752):

“Knowledge and forgiveness are not legally to be presumed.”

If, however, any reasonable man in the husband's position and with the information he had would have known that the intimate association had continued right up to the time of his visit, then it may be inferred that the husband probably did know. At all events, the facts would raise a provisional presumption of knowledge sufficient to call upon the husband to displace it. That seems to have been the view of the commissioner in this case. He thought that the husband knew that the association between his wife and Mr. Hall had not ceased, and, if there was nothing more in the case, I doubt whether this court would have interfered on the ground of want of knowledge of material facts.

There is one remaining point, however, to which the commissioner has not addressed his mind. The evidence showed that, even after the husband's visit, letters had passed between the wife and Mr. Hall and, moreover, that on Apr. 5 she went with Mr. Hall to his solicitor to whom she made a statement “sort of in revenge” against her husband which was the basis of the evidence she gave in court. Those are facts which at once raise the question: Was this intimate association still continuing even after the husband's visit? For, if it was, it would operate to revive the adultery, even if it had been condoned. The letters since the visit were not produced in court, nor did the co-respondent or the wife give evidence of the nature of the association. Indeed, if it was an intimate association, they might claim privilege from saying anything about it. It was at this point, if not before, that, in my opinion, a serious miscarriage of justice may have taken place. At the close of the petitioner's case there was nothing whatever to support the suggestion that there had been condonation. The wife herself did not put it forward as part of her case. The only person who raised it was the co-respondent. He raised it, not in the interests of justice or to save the marriage, but to save his own pocket. He raised it at the last moment, taking the husband's advisers by surprise, when he could have raised it a month before. It was he who had taken the wife to his own solicitors, to whom she told her story “sort of in revenge” against her husband. It was he who saw to it that she was subpoenaed and thus compelled to give evidence against her husband, much against her will. Up till now he has succeeded. On this point of condonation, which was not pleaded, the petition has not only been dismissed, with not a penny damages against the co-respondent who has broken up the home, but the husband has been ordered to pay the co-respondent's costs. If ever there was a case where the provisional presumption against condonation should have stood the husband in good stead until it was displaced, this was the case. It is because the commissioner does not seem to have realised this, that I think this appeal should be allowed. He did not properly direct himself on the burden of proof, but this court did not see the witnesses and cannot say what the result would have been if he had properly directed himself. There must, therefore, be a new trial.

HODSON, J. : This case raises an important question on the construction of the Judicature Act, 1925, s. 198. I will not re-read the section. The husband's contention is that the wife, respondent to the petition, was unlawfully compelled by the learned commissioner to give evidence at the trial, she not being a compellable witness. In the circumstances I think that, although no direct order was given to the witness by the commissioner, she was compelled to give evidence. Was she compellable? The section uses the word "competent" and omits the words "and compellable" which appear in the same statute in an earlier section, namely, s. 176 (now repealed), the proviso to which reads as follows :

"Provided that nothing in this Act shall affect the right of a wife to present a petition for divorce on any ground on which she might, if the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1923, had not passed, have presented such a petition, and on any petition presented by a wife for divorce on the ground of the adultery and cruelty, or adultery and desertion, of her husband, the husband and wife shall be competent and compellable to give evidence with respect to the cruelty or desertion."

Contrasting these sections in the same statute, it would appear that compellability to give evidence is not necessarily to be inferred from competence to do so. The same conclusion is reached by consideration of Leach v. R. (2), a decision of the House of Lords on the construction of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, s. 4, which provides :

"(1) The wife or husband of a person charged with an offence under any enactment mentioned in the schedule to this Act may be called as a witness either for the prosecution or defence and without the consent of the person charged."

The argument of Sir John Simon, the Solicitor-General, which was read by BUCKNILL, L.J., was rejected by the House, and LORD ATKINSON said ([1912] A.C. 311) :

"The principle that a wife is not to be compelled to give evidence against her husband is deep seated in the common law of this country, and I think if it is to be overturned it must be overturned by a clear, definite, and positive enactment, not by an ambiguous one such as the section relied upon in this case."

The history of the relevant legislation is as follows. The Evidence Act, 1851, ss. 2, 3 and 4, made parties to an action competent and compellable, but made exceptions in the case of criminal proceedings and proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and actions for breach of promise of marriage. The Evidence Act, 1853, ss. 1 and 2, made the husbands and wives competent and compellable in any proceedings except criminal proceedings and proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery. At the passing of the latter Act, therefore, the husband and wife were neither competent nor compellable to give evidence against the other in any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 6, in certain cases husband and wife were made competent and compellable even though proceedings were instituted in consequence of adultery :

A "On any petition presented by a wife, praying that her marriage may be dissolved by reason of her husband having been guilty of adultery coupled with cruelty, or of adultery coupled with desertion, the husband and wife respectively shall be competent and compellable to give evidence of or relating to such cruelty or desertion."

B This section was replaced by s. 176 of the Act of 1925 to which I have previously referred. By the Evidence Further Amendment Act, 1869, the words "or in any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery" in s. 2 of the Act of 1853 were repealed. This repeal had the effect of bringing husband and wife in such proceedings within the general provisions of the Evidence Act, 1851, s. 1. The Act of 1869, however, not only repealed the above-mentioned provision of the Act of 1853, but also dealt with the particular case of parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery, and by s. 3 made the enactment now repealed but reproduced in s. 198 of the Act of 1925.

C Parliament having, therefore, dealt with the particular subject-matter of parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and their husbands and wives independently of the general provisions must, it is argued, be taken to have intended their competence and compellability as witnesses to be governed by the particular provision. Accordingly, the word "compellable" being omitted after the word "competent" in s. 198 of the Act of 1925, the parties are said not to be compellable witnesses at all in proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery. This argument has not hitherto been accepted and the principal text book writers are unanimous in stating that husband and wife, being competent and compellable by virtue of the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1851, are no less compellable by reason of the existence of the provisions of s. 3 of the Act of 1869 : see TAYLOR ON EVIDENCE, 12th ed., p. 853, and PHIPSON ON EVIDENCE, 7th ed., p. 443 ; see also WILLS ON EVIDENCE, 3rd ed., p. 134, where the author's opinion to the contrary no longer appears. The same view was accepted by LOPES, J., in Nottingham Guardians v. Tomkinson (6) (4 C.P.D. 349). The courts have themselves hitherto acted on the view that the parties are not only competent, but compellable (for example, to answer interrogatories), subject to the protection extended not only to them but to other witnesses in proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery in respect of questions tending to show adultery. In my judgment, this view is correct. Section 198 of the Act of 1925 is not inconsistent with s. 3 of the Act of 1851, and does not, therefore, necessarily operate so as to make an exception to the general rule of compellability contained therein. The protection extended by the second part of s. 198 limits the compellability introduced by the earlier Act by restricting the scope of admissible questions, but does not go to the extent of declaring that the witnesses (whether parties or not) are not otherwise compellable. In short, their competence is unlimited, but there is a limit to their compellability.

H In my view, therefore, the husband's contention as to the supposed wrongful admission of the evidence of the wife fails. I agree that on the issue of condonation the trial was unsatisfactory since the petitioner was taken by surprise and I agree that there should be a new trial. I also agree that, as a matter of common sense, the courts are always slow to act on the uncorroborated evidence of a woman who has become separated from her husband by reason of her adultery when she seeks to establish condonation by proving that sexual intercourse has taken place between herself and her husband after he has obtained knowledge of her adultery. I do not think, however, that there can be said to be any rule to this effect. The corroboration obtainable in criminal cases is not likely to be available and unless the parties are living together the sexual act itself is not readily capable of proof even inferentially by evidence other than that of the parties themselves. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 4, casts a duty on the court to satisfy itself upon the evidence inter alia whether there has been condonation on the part of the petitioner. It is true that connivance and condonation are set side by side in the section, but the presumption which exists against connivance must necessarily be stronger than any presumption against condonation, since the former is a presumption of innocence and the latter is in a different category. There is nothing wrong, or, indeed, improbable, in a husband condoning his wife's adultery. Although the surrounding circumstances have to be examined in each case as well as the evidence of the parties themselves before a conclusion is reached, it is open to the court to come to the conclusion that sexual intercourse has taken place between the parties on the evidence of the woman alone.

So far as the facts of the present case were disclosed at the hearing, it appears that there were passages in the husband's evidence dealing with his intention to restore the home in the future which tended to support the probabilities of the wife's story. As for the letters passing between the wife and the co-respondent after she left the petitioner's house and before the alleged acts of sexual intercourse, I do not think that there was anything material added to the petitioner's knowledge by them. He obtained possession of the letters from the co-respondent, according to the wife, on Feb. 21, the day of the first alleged intercourse and, according to the husband, on the following day, although he did not read them until later. When she confessed her adultery on Jan. 30, 1948, she said she was still seeing the co-respondent, presumably on the same terms as before, and the co-respondent made a similar confession at the same time. There is no evidence that she practised any fraud upon her husband, such as concealing her pregnancy, as in Roberts v. Roberts and Temple (19), or even the extent of the meetings. The actual number of occasions on which they had met since the date of the confession could not, in my opinion, be material in the absence of fraud.

Appeal allowed with costs. Order made for new trial. Costs in court below reserved to judge in new trial.

Solicitors: S. C. Elphick, agent for Kelham & Sons, Stamford (for the husband); J. Hunt, Peterborough (for the co-respondent).

[Reported by C. N. BEATTIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

END OF VOLUME 2.

UL - 5 MAY 1978

